Statehouse Gossip

By ERNEST L. GRAY

With half of the special session of the Oregon legislature now history, it appears that all the work has yet to be done. Truly all the committees have been at work, and working hard, but floor action is still to be taken on the major issues—new capital and those proposals for the social security act which cannot be held over.

Chief among the social security acts is the old age pension assistance, whereby the federal government should cooperate should the state law be made to conform to the national act. It was believed further that pressure will bring out the unemployment insurance proposal for consideration at this session.

The social security acts, by far more important in dollars and cents and to the general public than the capitol reconstruction program, originally called for seven bills. These were listed as old age assistance, assistance to the blind, crippled children, dependent children, old age benefits, maternal health and unemployment insurance.

But since the governor is anxious to keep consideration down to a minimum, with the exception of capitol legislation, it was believed advisable to keep all these proposals out, with the exception of the old age assistance and possible unemployment insurance. But these in themselves loom as the major issues of the session.

But for a moment let's consider the old age assistance act. This law will require reducing the age limit from 70 years to 65 years, and to make a payment of $30 a month rather than the average of $11 now paid. It also provides that the federal government will pay half, the state a quarter, and the counties the remaining quarter.

A survey of the picture reveals that the number of cases now listed over 70 years of age requiring pensions totals 10,379, of which 3,186 are in Multnomah county. Some estimate that if they lower the age to 65 years, so as to conform to the national act, it would bring this total up to 17,889 cases. Others contend this figure too low.

But for the purpose of a base, this figure will be used to show the state must appropriate $1,609,200 annually to care for the persons within the age limit. The counties likewise would have to put up this amount while the federal government will contribute enough to match the two. This means that it will be necessary to raise from all sources a total of $6,436,800 annually.

On the outside all the legislature would have to appropriate for a new capitol would be less than three million dollars, and that over a period of two or three years. That will indicate just how the two measures compare as to financial importance. The pension proposal is a giant issue and will create much debate.

The state of Oregon owns buildings and equipment in excess of $21,000,000. It was recently brought out in a legislative committee hearing. This argument was used in urging the state to carry insurance rather than leave it to a small restoration fund, which at the time of the capitol fire amounted only to $150,000.

Regardless of Governor Martin's proposal that nothing but emergency legislation be introduced, the two houses saw introduced just 65 bills at adjournment Monday night, with promise of many more coming in. Among the latter will be the corrected A. A. bill to replace the one the supreme court recently declared unconstitutional.

Wheat Adjustment Checks Ready for Distribution at Series of Meetings

Checks covering the first adjusted payment on the 1935 crop and the last adjusted payment on the 1934 crop will be on hand to distribute to wheat contract signers at a series of meetings to be held Saturday, Monday and Tuesday, November 2, 4, and 5, respectively. At these meetings the new wheat contract covering the crop for 1935, 1937, 1938 and 1939 will be explained. A few contract signers will not receive checks at this time as in the first lot of checks which are coming there and only 265 checks and there are 326 contracts. These checks will be along later.

Applications for the new wheat contracts will be presented at the meetings with the essential data already in them, this having been taken from the old contract and compliance forms. Any operator of a farm that grew wheat during the years 1930, 1931, or 1932 will be eligible to sign a new wheat contract. As far as is known at this time the wheat base for the new contract will be the same as for the old one. The amount of reduction is changed, the use of contracted acreage is a little more stringent and the method of determining the total amount of the payment has been slightly changed. The explanation of the new set-up need not take much time. The checks will be distributed at each meeting place.

The schedule of these meetings is as follows: Saturday, Nov. 2—9:30 a. m. at the Forest Grove Chamber of Commerce; Saturday, Nov. 2—1:30 p. m. at Moore's hall at Roy; Monday, Nov. 4, 9:30 a. m. at Laurel hall; Monday, Nov. 4—1:30 p. m. at Aloha Grange; Monday, Nov. 4—8 p. m. at West Union; Tuesday, Nov. 5—1:30 p. m. at Sherwood city hall.

Main Problem for Turkey Raisers is Cost of Production

"The present day trend of turkey expansion indicates a strong possibility that within a few days its numbers will be increased more rapidly than the per capita rate of consumption will readily absorb at good prices," stated H. E. Cosby, extension poultryman of the Oregon State College, at a meeting of Washington county turkey growers, which was held in the Forest Grove Chamber of Commerce rooms, Wednesday, October 23 at 8 p. m., according to L. E. Francis, assistant county agent. Thirty-one Washington county growers were present at this meeting.

Cosby further commented that the big problem now before the turkey growers was the cost per pound of production. Feeding turkeys is no longer the relatively simple matter that it was several years ago because the consumer demand calls for a turkey carrying a much finer and more uniform fattening. This market demand is not being entirely met by all growers with the result that turkey producers, in order to protect their market and maintain a good price for their products, are going to have to improve the quality of their finished birds.

With the introduction of the more artificial methods of raising turkeys comes the customary increase in disease, a problem which has not been of much consequence in former years but now warrants serious consideration.

According to Cosby indications this year year that there are fewer turkeys produced in the United States as a whole than last year, and that the market demand will probably be greater with the result that top birds should bring a good price and realize a good profit to the producer.

The remainder of the discussion was devoted to the results of experimental work which has been conducted at the Umatilla Field Station at Hermiston. This experimental work has covered two years and its purpose has been to determine which of several types of feed and feeding methods will produce the most rapid and the most economical gains. Results of this experimental work are published in the Oregon State Agricultural College Circular of Information No. 124, "Finishing the Turkey for Market," which is available upon request at the county agent's office.

14 Years on the Job

Tuesday evening W. H. Boswell terminated fourteen years work, with only three weeks vacation during same period. 52 weeks per year, for 14 years, or 725 weeks work, 3 weeks rest—some record.

Restore Old Channel

Back in 1908 the Oregon Electric constructed their R. R. line to Garden Home through Beaverton to Hillsboro and Forest Grove.

In so doing a large fill was made across the Beavertown on what is known as the Pat Kelly place, 1/4 miles northwest of Beaverton, with four culverts during the winter's high water—the water became so high at this fill that it raised 13 feet from low water mark and flowed over the top of the fill—then the R. R. people built a short trestle, making an opening through the fill. In so doing the Beavertown ditch channel has been changed to a letter "Z" and this is one of the reasons why there was so much high water on the Beavertown since that date (1908). Property owners along the creek are invited to look over this "Z" channel, at the first R. R. trestle "12-7F" Northwest of town on the O.-E. This new channel is washing away much valuable soil on West side of fill, belonging to Pat Kelly.

For the best interests of Beaverton's drainage system the O. E. R. should be requested to build an additional trestle at this point—approximately 84 feet—restore the old channel for best results.

This week the ditching crew are about 2-3 through the P. J. Kelly property, nearing the Charles Bernard place on north, Cora Wetherill property on South. 18 men are working this week. Totodate 2 1/2 miles of ditch work has been completed.

Hot Catsup!

Down at the Mission Bell Service station Lester Squires has served his customers with gasoline for a long period.

Desire Study of Farm Situation in County to Future Progress

Representatives of every type of farming in Washington county met last Friday at the county agent's office and requested that an agricultural economic conference be held for the purpose of making a careful study of the farm situation and to develop recommendations for agricultural development of the county, according to W. F. Cyrus, county agent. W. J. Enschede, Hillsboro, route 4, was elected chairman of the general committee. A tentative list of commodity committees representing dairy, poultry, general livestock, farm crops and horticulture were made up and will be announced as soon as the appointments are accepted.

"Conferences of this nature are not new in Oregon or in Washington county," says Cyrus. "From 1924 to 1928 at least one such conference was held in practically every Oregon county. In Washington county these studies were made and the final reports made public January 28 and 29, 1925. Careful study was made of the economic principles involved in the production and marketing of agricultural commodities. Reports issued by the committees of farmers made up a printed report that has been in much demand since that time and has been particularly requested by prospective new people coming into the county. In addition it has served as a source of information to anyone interested."

Since that date conditions have changed, we have had a prolonged period of depression and it seems appropriate to take stock and do a little planning again. In looking over the old report it is interesting to note how accurately these farmer groups predicted developments and how effectively some of their recommendations have been carried out. In Washington county we are now growing some crops that received no mention in the 1925 report. Some of our seed crops notably vetch and Austrian field peas fall into this class. In the horticultural crops we have had new berries come on since that time which has, along with other factors, somewhat changed the berry situation. Those people who have discussed this and are interested feel that study and consideration of the status of things now and what is needed by farmers and business people should be helpful in determining a program of agricultural development and in getting accurate information before the public as to the needs and economic possibilities.
