Blarney Stone Attracts

Visitors From All Lands

When the pleasant fiction of the Blarney stone began is not historically dated, though the expression "blarney" is said to date to the Elizabethan days, according to a writer in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. It is supposed to define a peculiar form of wheedling Irish eloquence, originally ascribed to a Lord Clancarty in his communications with the English queen. His failure to fulfill his promise to surrender the castle and his knack of explaining plausible excuses with wordy lengths left the queen indig-nent but never satisfied.

The stone which is divided into three was the work of a lunatic who cast the loose stone from the top. Which of the three parts was placed in the present position is not clear, but the drop of the stone and its replacement involves an acrobatic feat for kissing. It is necessary to lie flat on the battlement, extending the body backwards and downwards, into the hollow in the wall, and then kissing the stone, which is above the face.

All Blarney, no less than its castle, goes back a long time. In the Second century, it was the seat of Eoin Mor, who shared the kingship of Ireland with Conn of the Hundred Battles. He was the ancestor of the McCarthys. The original castle was built in 1445 by Cormac McCarthy, "the Strong." It was one of the Jeffreys who was responsible for the establishment of the town of Blarney in its modern aspect. The establishment dates back to the middle of the Eighteenth century, when a grandiose scheme of town planning and building caught the imagination of the owners of Blarney. In the plan the village was to be strangely embellished by quadrangles and triangular lawns. In order to fulfill the ambitious scheme, an effort was made to change the course of the Awmartin river by means of a cut and fine stone bridges. The project was undertaken but abandoned because of its elaborateness of purpose.

Some Weigh and Measure

All our measurements are governed by the most accurate standards imaginable, but because this is so it must not be thought that a great many people do not measure and weigh and reckon time in a most haphazard manner, declares a writer in London Tit-Bits Magazine.

Our mile is 1,760 yards, but the Burmese reckons his mile as equal to the distance he can walk in the middle of the day, when it is hottest, without stopping for a rest.
In Egypt the Great Pyramid throws a shadow at sundown which is said to reach for miles, and this used to be a sign for the rice workers to knock off.

Some people in the Rhineland do not boil eggs by means of automatic timers; they prefer the old way of repeating the Lord's Prayer slowly, when they know the eggs are done.

Even the canal men in Holland do not always look at maps to see the number of miles they have covered. They know by the number of pipes they have smoked on the journey.

"Pardons" Among Unique

Ceremonies in Brittany

The region of Brittany, whose country and language differ from France, observes unique ceremonies known as "pardons" in honor of local saints, usually unknown to the rest of the world. The most colorful pardons, semi-pagan festivals of the dead dating from pre-Christian days but transformed by the church, are those of Saint Nicodeme, the one at Quimper, and the one honoring the grandmother of Jesus at Sainte Anne de la Palue.

The pardon of Saint Nicodeme centers attention to the blessing of the cattle of the region. Cows are decorated with ribbons and cockades and are led in the procession, with drums beating and banners flying. The animals are then auctioned by the church beadle, their purchase bringing good luck to the stables where they are taken.

The Bretons believe that Saint Anne, the mother of the Virgin Mary, was a Breton by birth, who before the birth of the Virgin voyaged to Palestine where she made her home. This Saint Anne is really an early goddess of the sea, but no one thinks of her in that role, as the widows of the sea, the women of lost fishermen, form the long procession behind the silken banners as it proceeds to the church for vespers services. The Goddess of the Sea was an imperious and cruel goddess, but under her new name canticles are sung.

Nowhere else in Brittany does one see such rich and gorgeous costumes. Every peasant who owns one of these costumes carefully preserves it year after year in a special cupboard which is never opened except for the day of the pardon.

The finest is worn by the eldest daughter, at whose dressing all the family takes part, the grandmother giving advice as she dresses, instructing the girl to walk in the procession with stately steps of dignified mien. The changing of the litanies during the procession, the muffled tapping of the drums, the silken banners carried by the men, make the scene as glittering and as medieval as anything to be seen anywhere in the world.

Pimento, Ginger, Other

Plant Types in Jamaica

Some 2,100 varieties of plant life are to be found in the island of Jamaica so that it is referred to, the world over, as the "botanical garden of the New World."

Pimento and annatto are prominent among the island's products—but pimento is not what the American housewife knows by name, being the common allspice, the berries of which grow in clusters on trees some 30 feet tall. Annatto, not familiar to the average tourist, is a reddish berry which, when boiled, yields an oily extract used as a dye.

The famed Jamaica ginger grows abundantly in patches on the red hillsides. The plant somewhat resembles the currant bush, but only the root is valuable, the tops being crushed and used again as seed.
A good yield, Jamaicans say, is 2,000 pounds of ginger to the acre.

Orchids, acres and acres of them, grow wild in this land of enchantment. The showy three-petalled flowers of lavender shade stand out in beautiful contrast to the white yucca, the aloe and other tropical blossoms. Then there is the fragrant bougainvillea, the brilliant poinciana, the melon cactus, often called the Turk's Cap, and the Woman Dildos, which produces wool along with the flowers and fruit.
