

Ending Overtime Classes
John Seery's Northwestern university classmates at Evanston, Ill., no longer will be subjected to over-doses of learning. "I owe it all to my alarm clock," the Jamaica Plains, Mass., sophomore said. Students in an accounting class complained that every period there was 10 or 15 minutes too long because the instructor said he was unable to hear the bell ending the period. To remedy the faintness of the school bell, Seery brought an alarm clock to class. Promptly at 3:50 the bell began to clang from behind its barricade of overcoats. The instructor assured students that thereafter they would be released on time—and without need of an alarm clock.

Where Quicksilver Comes From
Quicksilver, or mercury, occurs in nature in a free state, both in lodes and placer deposits, but only in very small quantities. Commercial mercury is obtained chiefly from cinabar ore, the sulphide of quicksilver, from which the pure mercury is extracted by subjecting it to high temperature and then condensing the vapor. The largest and richest deposit of mercury ore is at Almaden in central Spain. It has been worked since the time of the Romans.

Fish Herders

Game wardens at Theresa, N. Y., assisted by representatives of sportsmen's clubs, maintain each spring a 24-hour guard over the thousands of wall-eyed pike that jam in the small tributaries to Indian river and Black lake. Following tradition of centuries these game fish trek from the deep waters of Black lake and the Lower Indian River to spawn in the small tributaries, some hardly ankle deep. They swim a distance of 20 miles or more, against strong currents, jump the falls over two 15-foot dams and after spending about two weeks in the shallows return again to the deep water.
