Earliest Style Saddles

Looked Like Armchairs

If you think that riding saddle is a ladylike custom introduced in the interests of modesty, you are mistaken—at least according to some stories on the origin of the custom. One account, according to the National Geographic society, suggests that sidesaddles were first seen in central Europe during the Fourteenth century, the invention of the malformed "Ugly Duchess," Margaret Maultasch, of the Tyrol. Another story has it that Anne of Bohemia, wife of England's Richard II, originated the sidesaddle as a means of getting around, since she was so deformed that it was impossible for her to use the saddles of the day. Research has disclosed, however, that Anne of Bohemia was not deformed.

The earliest saddles, complete with back, arms and footboard, were more like traveling armchairs—or the elaborate seats used in the East for camel and elephant back—than a mere convenience of locomotion. The invention of the simpler, modern sidesaddle has been attributed to Italy. France took up the style, which spread finally to much of the world of feminine riders.

Women's riding costumes remained generally trouserless until well into the Nineteenth century in spite of the custom of many to sit astride their mounts. Such clothes were often as ornate as ballroom gowns. Brilliant colors in silk and velvet, pleats, ruffles, long flowing skirts, and bird-of-paradise hats were worn by well-to-do women riders.

On their "gently ambling horses" the leisurely ladies sometimes even carried parasols and fans instead of riding crops. Yet, feminine as these early styles appear in modern eyes, gentlemen of the day "viewed with alarm" what they called the "masculinity" of women's riding garments. The Seventeenth century English diarist Pepys protested that "Only for a long petticoat dragging under their men's coats, nobody would take them for women... a sight that did not please me."

Fife and Drum Music

Formerly Used in Army

Fifes and drums stirred the hearts of Americans when our forefathers went forth to fight the battles of the Revolution, displaying the sort of patriotic pride so admirably depicted in the "Spirit of 1776."

Long after the Revolution the shrill tones of the fife, with its accompanying drum-beats, supplied the rhythm for the measured tread of marching men, remaining in favor for about a hundred years.

It was not until 1875 that the army discontinued the use of the fife and adopted the trumpet, mainly with a view to signaling field units too far distant to hear the more subdued tones of the fife. Six years later the U. S. marine corps also discarded the shrill-toned instrument for the keyless trumpet, or bugle.

But this change did not come about without some protests from grizzled old fifers. Continental marines had used fifes to attract recruits and had further stimulated a fervent patriotism by painting colored rattlesnakes on their drums.

Napoleon's Sword

Bearing the inscription, "N. Bonaparte, First Consul of the French Republic," a sword has been added to an exhibition in Moscow dedicated to the victory of the Russian people over Napoleon in 1812. When Napoleon was defeated and sent to Elba by the coalition Alexander I, of Russia, ordered Count Shuvalov to accompany him. To assist Napoleon to escape recognition by the crowds, Shuvalov offered him his greatcoat. In gratitude, the de-throned emperor gave his sword to Shuvalov, who took it to Russia. In the revolution of 1917 the Red Guard raided a family estate and a commander appropriated a sword. He fought with it, often marveling at its strength and sharpness. After the war it was identified as Napoleon's sword.
