Wm. F. Cyrus, County Agent, Faye Nichols, Home Demonstration Agent, Palmer Torvend, Assistant County Agent.

Home gardeners in Washington county and western Oregon are fortunate in the fact that it is possible to store much of the garden vegetables in the ground.

Cellars or basements may be used if they are not too warm. Where there is a furnace in the basement that is used in heating the house it is usually much too warm for most vegetables. This difficulty can be overcome by partitioning off a corner and providing an inlet for cool fresh air from the outside. If shelves or racks are provided for storing vegetables these will permit the circulation of air and the necessary ventilation.

Beets, carrots, parsnips, salsify, turnips, and rutabagas may be kept in the ground in an ordinary season. In doing this it is usually a good plan to cut off the tops and cover them with dirt. Sometimes this is unnecessary because we may not have weather cold enough to freeze them even if the upper part of the root is exposed. If the tops are removed and a small amount of dirt shoveled on to the row so that it is covered 3 or 4 inches deep there will be ample protection from frost. These several root crops do not store in a fruit or root cellar satisfactorily because they shrivel badly. When they are stored it is necessary to surround them with moist earth.

Beans and peas that are to be kept over or stored for future use, either seed or food should be fumigated with carbon bisulphide to kill the weevil. Five to eight pounds to 100 bushels of seed is adequate. For small lots, a tablespoonful of carbon bisulphide poured over a half gallon jar of threshed seed will be adequate if it is left tightly closed for 48 hours. The temperature of the fumigating room should be above 60 deg F. After such fumigation the peas and beans if they are to be used for food, should be thoroughly aerated. Carbon bisulphide is highly inflammable and will kill humans or livestock as well as insects.

Cabbage, celery, onions, pumpkins and squash all have their particular storage problems. Cabbage keeps best at a temperature approaching 32 to 40 degrees. It is usually desirable to leave the heads in the field as long as there is no severe freezing. Where it is necessary to protect the cabbage from real low temperatures they may be pulled up and the entire plant placed in a trench and covered with dirt. The outer leaves should be left on.

Home gardeners frequently store potatoes in poorly ventilated bins or cellars. Under such conditions the temperature may be too high. Putting a slatted floor underneath the tubers in the bottom of the bin provides for a natural air draft which keeps the potatoes in firm condition much later than an unventilated storage place. The most difficult garden crops to store properly are pumpkins and squash. There is nearly always some decay. Not all of this may be prevented but the best remedy is to avoid all bruises and to not pile them up in the field before putting them in storage. They require a reasonably warm, dry and ventilated storage place. Low humidity is important.

More complete storage information may be obtained from the county agent office. A recent publication from the Oregon State College extension service entitled Vegetable Storage covers the more simple problems connected with storing these important vegetable food crops. This bulletin may be had either by writing for it or by personal call at the county agent office.
