FHA, OTC to Handle Farm Construction

Farmers and ranchers who need information, priority assistance or authorization to begin construction should now take their problems on dwellings to the Federal Housing Administration and non-dwelling construction to the Office of Temporary Controls, both agencies have offices in Portland. Transfer to the authority on construction programs from the county Triple-A offices was made formally on December 24. USDA offices concerned with the farm construction program throughout the war have worked with FHA and OTC in setting up procedure to handle agricultural applications and requests along with non-farm applications.

Safety Hints To Drivers

Carbon monoxide poisoning has been warned against by Secretary of State Robert S. Farrell Jr. Noting the cold weather, he said, "The average car has been in service much longer than anyone ever expected, and it may easily have developed leaks since last winter."

Farrell said he has observed over a period of years that the traffic death rate swings up during the winter months due to poor visibility and slippery streets. This year he fears in addition an increased number of carbon monoxide cases. Asked how to guard against carbon monoxide, Farrell cited three main dangers: (1) warming up cars in closed garages; (2) leaking exhaust systems and floor boards; and (3) faulty manifold type car heaters. Twenty-two hundred American lives were claimed by poison gases last year. Of these, approximately one-fourth were taken by carbon monoxide. Contrary to frequent opinion, this gas is completely odorless and cannot be detected by any of the senses.
