Traffic Division Asks Slow-Down For School Kids

Schools throughout the state begin to reopen this week and the traffic safety division, Salem, issues an appeal to Oregon motorists to drive slowly in or near school zones.

More students than ever before will be going to school this fall, the division said. Extreme caution will be needed if children are not to pay for driver mistakes by their lives. Speeds in school zones have increased as much as 75 percent during the summer. These first few weeks of school, the division stressed, can be particularly dangerous if motorists do not remember to slow down.

BEAVERTON ENTERPRISE—Friday, September 8, 1950

The division also reminded drivers of the school bus stop law, first put into effect last fall, which requires cars to stop when either approaching or overtaking a stopped school bus loading or unloading children.
