That Oregonian

Pardon us for bringing up the subject—much too often discussed in other newspapers—of the staid old Oregonian and its frequent editorial policy. Knowingly we launch into a hackneyed topic.

Once we termed that eminent Portland morning newspaper a "weather-vane," but we take it all back now. We'd rather change our one-word description to "gossip." And even The Oregonian sensed the opening left for criticism when it headed a disrespectful paragraph concerning President Roosevelt's family with an apology.

It may be just a boyish notion, but somehow we always thought that the president of these United States and his immediate family were hardly fit subjects for sarcastic quipping, particularly on a topic which might be regarded as strictly family business. We realize The Oregonian has no political love or respect for democratic Roosevelt, but the notion creeps in that most certainly The Oregonian, or any other newspaper, should have enough self respect and sufficient high regard for our historic White House and its symbolic importance to us to do their personal punning in other fields.

Though any newspaper is entitled to take whatever stand it chooses concerning policies and politics of any incumbent, it seems rather cheapening for an institution as important and dignified as The Oregonian to delve into family affairs of the Roosevelt children for editorial sarcasm. After all, there are some private affairs that are better left to the family for analysis, even if those involved do happen to be children of our president and first lady.

Which just goes to show that people who point in public draw attention to their finger as well as its target.
