An Old American Custom

In America, there is a quaint saying that all men were created equal. Pretty speech and a fine theory, but little else, though this country is nearer that goal than most.

One of the things that wrecked prohibition was the unequal way the law was enforced. Mr. Gottrocks could give the law a sly wink and go on with his party while the ordinary run of cuss would get the works. People lost respect for a law which meant the straight and narrow for one class and a special privilege for another. Prohibition, under such enforcement—or lack of it—couldn't exist.

It now appears that the New Deal, the Blue Eagle, is doomed for the same fate unless it is saved from the habitual partiality shown through our bulky and laborious habits of government. We see strict adherence to the rules one place and just across the street may be a competitor who works his help all hours of the day and night, and who seeks every evasion of the letter and principle of NRA. Some employers here in southern Oregon are abiding by their respective codes, while others are laughing up their sleeves at the regulations and telling themselves the Blue Eagle is nothing more or less than a noble gesture to be observed by the suckers.

With uneven enforcement of the New Deal—which is typically American in everything we do—the Blue Eagle is doomed to the same fate as prohibition. Nothing can survive in an alleged democracy that is being applied undemocratically. When you tell school children they were all created equal, and are to be governed by the same laws as their countrymen, they resent seeing any statute work for some and not for others when they grow up.

The NRA codes are pinning some business men down, while others are violating its principles. If this condition continues, it won't be long until everyone will be so disgusted with the thing that it can't possibly exist for after all, in one sense, the New Deal is an economic prohibition.

The Point of View

There has been much editorial sarcasm and comment lately about how our present government has abandoned the old order of things and is replacing tried and true American principles of government with new-fangled college-professor ideas.

But, on the other hand, it may be that Roosevelt's New Deal, in principle and practice, is merely a return to original fundamentals for which our forefathers fought and bled. Possibly Mr. Roosevelt is just calling a rose by another name when he gives us alphabetical titles for governmental functions.

We may take salts one time and calomel another when we are sick, but our objective in either case is good health. The New Deal doesn't seem to conflict with the old standby, "Government of the people, by the people and for the people."

So, to sum it all down, one's opinion of the New Deal depends largely on his point of view. At any rate we can be certain the White House has a good man as its master; a man with practical and humanitarian ideas, and the energy to back them up.
