Olmscheid Is Right

Why people, who have an axe to grind, always want to chop something down with it is a mystery to most of us. But that seems to be the case, as far as the attempted organization of fruit workers of southern Oregon in Medford is concerned lately.

Of course, there are many orchardists who will attempt to pay the same scale of wages as last season, when they were forced to rock bottom rates through necessity, while this year growers will receive a reasonable sum for their fruit. One of the chief objectives of the administration's efforts to raise the price of farm products has been—like in industry, too—not to put money into the hands of owners and employers alone, but to put it in hands of all workers connected with farming and, in this case, fruitraising.

There are instances known where ridiculously low wages are being paid pickers, and where growers alibi that they have been taking it on the chin for several seasons and are entitled to a breathing spell between higher prices and higher wages that will absorb some of the advantage. But this type of grower evidently forgets that the laborer and picker, too, has been taking it on the chin during past few seasons.

However sympathetic we might be with underpaid pickers, however, it is hard to see where the Cannery and Agricultural Workers union is going to help much. Such leadership among unorganized classes seldom is to the good, and The Miner believes Sheriff Olmscheid is wise in appointing 250 special deputies "just in case."

The Miner is a booster for organized labor and has always carried a union label in its masthead. But it feels that, just as capital has an obligation to labor to understand humanity, labor has a moral obligation to itself and to the country to be rational and honest about its use of organization. And for that reason we can see no probable benefit to come from the invasion of doubtful organizers into this section, but can see much potential trouble.

Unionism, in its more honest and sincere aspects, is a good and wholesome thing for the worker, the employer and the country. But floaters, pickers and youngsters employed in fruitraising and harvesting can hardly be expected to understand real values of unionism and organization in a few days time. Those not instilled with the nobler phases of collective bargaining are more likely to behave as a mob instead of an organization when taking concerted action.

The word "union," however, has been a prominent one in the history of our country. And it means just as much to the progress of labor and business as it did to the several states who recognized the fact that "in union there is strength."

But the "strength" has human value only when it is used in a constructive, manner.

Such Modesty!

Southern Oregon's leading daily, the Medford Mail Tribune, modestly claims it has "more paid-up circulation" than all other newspapers of the county combined. The Trib concludes from this that advertisers need only the one medium and that they are more or less duplicating their expenditures when they use other smaller papers over the county.

But even the Tribune must feel a shortcoming somewhere, for it publishes 5000 free copies of a "merchants" edition to fill in gaps it seems to feel are left by its paid-for distribution. With this free sheet added to their list, the Tribune is attempting to educate advertisers—the ones who furnish lifeblood to the press—to use the one medium, and to forego the weeklies.

But somehow or other we feel confident southern Oregonians don't want a one-sided monopoly from a business standpoint, because that would give them a one-sided monopoly from a news standpoint, also. There are a few readers who like to have an editor at home when civil war breaks loose, and who appreciate the story behind a story of how a crank flew up and blacked someone's eye.

And, just as much as one newspaper can't give all angles to a situation in its news columns, is it impossible for a lone newspaper to possess all the advantages from an advertiser's standpoint. Human beings may stand out from their fellows, and they may be larger and more powerful, but still it takes all of us to make this a balanced, rational world.

Newspapers are no exception. Size and circulation, in themselves, are not all-saving virtues.

And, anyway, the Tribune's claim to possess more paid-up circulation than all other newspapers in Jackson county is a gross misstatement to begin with. But then, no one ever sees themselves as others do.

Golf Clubs for Sale

Rivers Peterson, chairman of the retail code authority, in a recent radio address had the following to say about "hardships" which codes work on small businessmen:

"There is talk about the hardships imposed upon small business concerns by codes. So far as the retail code is concerned most of the complaints from small business concerns have been that the rules were not stringent enough. * * I know the trials and troubles of the small merchant. In only one respect does the retail code impose a hardship on him.

"He does have to work longer hours than he formerly did so his employes may not work as long as they once did. But I have never known a business to suffer because its owner was forced to work long and hard. Thousands who have attained success have worked longer and harder than any code will ever require.

"The retail code may take some business men off the golf course, or away from other distracting diversions, but the time may come when they will count these seeming hardships as blessings."

Work generally is a great bother to most of us but, like Mr. Peterson says, it also is a great blessing. And particularly necessary during times like these when we all are interested in climbing back to business security.

However, the fact that NRA's demand that the small employer work harder that his employes may work less hours is one of the many paradoxes that are resulting from an application of theory to a condition.
