was significantly lower than on the old clean cultivated type.

Most people are disturbed to find grass creeping into their alfalfa fields, but on the Union branch experiment station they are going so far as to deliberately seed some grasses with alfalfa. The reason is that when bare spots appear in ordinary alfalfa fields the tendency is for cheat grass—which is worse than nothing—to creep in, lowering the value of the hay. By seeding a certain amount of good grass with the alfalfa, it is believed that weed grass will be kept out. The fairway type of crested wheat grass is proving best for this purpose so far.

At least 4,000 acres of the new Rex wheat, bred and distributed from the Moro branch experiment station, were grown in Oregon last year. Farmers are clamoring for more seed than is available. It is expected to replace all of the Fortyfold acreage in Sherman county. It has proved itself fully winter hardy, a high yielder, and with strong resistance to smut.

Facts, Figures From Experiment Stations

Comparative tests made by feeding cows alfalfa hay with and without grain on the Hermiston branch experiment station indicate that it is profitable to feed grain to cows that are capable of producing a good volume of milk. Feed costs per pound of fat were about the same with both groups, but the cows fed grain produced consistently higher. Fears that a straight ration of alfalfa hay might be a cause of poor breeding efficiency were not borne out by the test, however, as there appeared to be no difference in this respect between the two groups.

The ability of trashy fallow to prevent water erosion, even under exceptional conditions, was demonstrated this summer in an area in Umatilla county where a near cloudburst struck. A field with trashy fallow held the downpour with no perceptible erosion, while a neighboring field which had been summer fallowed the old way was washed out to plow depth. In five years of testing on the Pendleton branch experiment station there has been only one year in which the yield on disked trashy fallow
