What Other Editors Are Saying!

SCREW-BALL DECISION ON FURNITURE FACTORIES

One of the craziest of government rulings on the books today is the labor department's decision that it is more expensive to live in Oregon where it is cheaper to live.

Or perhaps that isn't stating the decision quite fairly, for it actually revolved around the rate of wages that shall be paid to furniture makers while they are working on government contract supplies.

The department decided that furniture makers in Washington and in California may be paid 10 cents per hour less than furniture makers in Oregon while manufacturing furniture for the government.

And it also decided that similar work performed in Idaho and Montana may be paid for at 25 cents per hour less.

Now we know little about the way the department's labor contract board goes about deciding what is a proper wage to be paid workers by manufacturers bidding on government business, but we imagine that the cost of workers' living ought to have some effect upon the decision.

And we also have no information on the cost of living in Idaho and Montana, but everybody on the coast knows that the cost of living in California, and in union-ridden Washington, is higher than the cost of living in Oregon where so many of the depression's victims moved to escape high living expenses in Washington and California.

So it looks mighty silly to us that with Oregon furniture wages set by the government at 60 cents an hour, California and Washington manufacturers should be allowed to pay their workers only 50 cents an hour and still qualify equally for government contracts.

Something ought to be done about it, of course. Oregon centers where there are furniture factories ought to protest about it. Which is about all that can be done about anything that the government determines by an executive act or bureaucratic decree.

And when it comes to protests Oregon's chances don't stack up very high against the greater populations of Washington and California.—Grants Pass Courier.

CHILD HEALTH

Child Health Day, May 1, 1939, centers attention of the U. S. on its public school health program.

In Miami, Fla., an unusually broad student health program is followed. Outdoor classes form an important part of the program, designed to benefit the transient student, of which Florida has many. After enrolling Johnny receives a general check-up from a physician.

"Say Ah now," urges the doctor, as he thoroughly examines the tonsils of all students registered. Health data is carefully compiled for reference purposes.

At recess time the younger pupils are anxious to receive their Florida orange juice or milk. This is supplied free of charge.

Athletics are considered fine, but not for weak hearts. A physician examines the "pumps" of these youngsters before they are allowed to engage in any strenuous sports on the school playground. Officials say that early training causes the children to be "health conscious" in later years, and for that reason is an invaluable asset to the nation as a whole.

Mrs. Don Travis returned Wednesday from Los Angeles where she was called by the death of her mother.
