Livestock Farms In Coast Region Prove Successful

Establishment and maintenance of pasture on properly adapted cut-over and brush lands in Coos and Curry counties are relatively profitable as a basis for an expanding sheep and cattle industry in that region, according to detailed studies by federal and state agricultural economists over the past few years.

Detailed findings of these economists, Harold R. Hochmuth of the USDA and William W. Gorton of the farm management department at Oregon State college, have just been published as station bulletin No. 381, entitled "Ranch Organization and Range Land Use in Coos and Curry Counties, Oregon."

Although many hazards exist in this livestock enterprise, returns are sufficient to warrant such hazards over a period of years, provide operators with a satisfactory income and at the same time increase the general taxable wealth of the region.

The investigators found that expansion of the livestock industry in this area in recent years is due to three factors. These are improved transportation, cooperation of forestry officials in the burning of logging slash and brush, and the introduction of improved varieties of grasses. It was found that improved grasses are an especially important item, not only for that region but throughout western Oregon, where one of the major needs is improvement of pasture growth in cut-over lands and in other livestock grazing areas.

Operators in Coos and Curry counties who have been maintaining these improved pastures the longest reported to the investigators that the amount of feed produced now is on the increase rather than decrease. This gradual improvement in the pastures is being accomplished at little cost aside from the labor of the operator and his family.

It was found that the "theoretical average" ranch in that region runs 500 sheep, makes a ranch income of $1533, a labor income of $708 and returns five percent on an investment of $33 per sheep.

Scouts Prepared for Emergency Service

Boy Scouts here and throughout the country are now training in Scoutcraft and outdoor lore with new vigor to be better prepared for any sort of emergency and disaster service. Scout troops are forming units of Emergency Service Corps (see emblem, upper right above) and being trained in firefighting, first aid, rescue work and other service connected with emergencies caused by storms, floods, hurricanes, earthquakes and any type of catastrophe.

At camp and on hikes, through games and other attractive activities of the regular Scout program, they are learning what to do in case of crisis and how to fulfill their promise to help other people at all times. Through demonstrations, displays and exhibits, in cooperation with established disaster relief agencies, they are doing their part to teach the American people to be prepared.
