BETTER DAIRY FEEDING
On the average farm approximately 50 percent of the total cost of producing milk or butterfat is feed cost, according to the authors of a new bulletin on "Feeding for Milk Production," issued recently at Oregon State college. Under present conditions, when dairy product prices are relatively high, more feed can be used economically in many cases, however. Early preparation for providing an abundance of pasture and other supplemental feeds this season to supplement hay and grain will insure both maximum production and maximum profits.

Post-War Agriculture Planning is Studied

Post-war planning in agriculture is an important part of the wartime effort, even though intensive work in this field may be postponed somewhat, according to both federal and state agricultural officials at Oregon State college.

In Oregon, post-war planning is considered primarily the work of county land use and agricultural planning committees. Advance work is already being done in preparing to carry the planning effort to every agricultural community, says William A. Schoenfeld, chairman of the state land use planning committee.

The job of fighting and of producing for the fighters can be done better if we can look to the future with confidence that the hazards and miseries of former post-war periods may be avoided, says Schoenfeld.

The first grade has been studying about fruits and vegetables and have written a poem about apples. This is one of their poems:

Rub, rub, rub!
Shine, shine, shine!
You never saw apples
Look so fine.

They have been studying about safety and have written a poem about that, too. It is:

We stop and look,
We look both ways,
When cars are coming,
We stop and wait.

On Tuesday, January 20, Mrs. Will Dodge gave room 6 a talk on New York City. She brought pictures of the Statue of Liberty, churches, theatres and the Empire State Building. She told of experiences in the subways and the elevated trains. New York is tearing down the elevated tracks because they are so dangerous.

One day as she was walking down a street she saw a sign which read "Cats and Dogs Beauty Parlor." It was a very fine talk and the children liked it.
