Greyhound Solves Wartime Problems

In a summary of the outstanding accomplishments of the nation's public transportation during the war period, F. W. Ackerman, Vice-President of Pacific Greyhound Lines, gives substantial credit to the traveling public. "Pacific Greyhound credits much of its success in solving wartime transportation problems to the splendid cooperation of civilian travelers," Mr. Ackerman said. "The impact of war brought a tremendous volume of new traffic," he pointed out. "Millions of men have been inducted into the armed forces since Pearl Harbor and have been brought by bus from every section of the United States. From widely scattered mobilization centers and training camps they have traveled widely on leaves, transfers and other military business. These necessary military movements of millions of men of the constantly growing military services have thrown a heavy load on all public carriers. Further, the amazing wartime growth of industry, with hundreds of new plants built and thousands expanded have created unprecedented demands for transportation of workers. Hundred of buses have been used exclusively in service to war plants and military centers."

To solve its problems Greyhound has worked out new methods of maintenance to keep buses in service, according to the Greyhound officials, is employing women as bus drivers, mechanics and service workers, and has frequently appealed for public cooperation through newspaper advertising. "Results have been extremely gratifying," he stated, "and in the field of public service Greyhound's wartime accomplishments have been called a transportation miracle."
