

A Place of Refuge

By Ruth Taylor

"Only the mind cannot be sent into exile." Though Ovid wrote that centuries ago, like all truths it is ageless.

Again and again in the history of our nation, it has been proven to us. Wave after wave of exiles from the strife, the hatreds, the discriminations and the persecutions of overcluttered Europe, have helped to settle and to build the nation which we hold to be the finest on earth.

Those who have come recently we call "refugees". However, this phrase wrongly sets them apart. Perhaps some among them are but refuge-seekers. Perhaps the minds of some the still overseas in their erstwhile homes. But these are but a few among the great numbers who come here in the same spirit as our own ancestors - because America is the land of promise, the land where a man might still be free before his conscience and his God. Their bodies may have gone into exile, but their minds have enriched the country to which they have come.

Expressive of these Americans by choice, Earl Harrison, formerly United States Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, once told a story which so impressed me that I want to repeat it here:

"A few weeks ago a leading attorney in one of our large cities was addressing a group of foreign-born petitioners who were about to be sworn in as American citizens. The speaker opened his address by saying that he was going to read several lines from the Preamble to the Constitution. As soon as he started, almost the entire group of petitioners - more than two hundred strong - recited in unison and from memory the lines he was reading. Incidentally, the man who reported the incident said that the speaker was about the only one in that room who had to read that part of the Preamble."

In commenting on his story, Mr. Harrison continued. "The days of unrestricted immigration are probably gone forever. But in the light of our history and the fine record made here by those who have come from other lands, we will undoubtedly keep our gates reasonably open. From the humanitarian point of view, we cannot do otherwise; from the point of self interest, new immigrants would be giving our country the strength that the infusion of new blood always brings to it, geared to the necessity of fighting for a democratic way of life; new Americans, who, thanks to the colossal stupidity of the Nazi regime are rapidly enriching our nation with the fruits of their skills and their brains. There can be no doubt about the goals these people share in common with the rest of our population."

"Only the mind cannot be sent into exile." Let us rejoice that throughout our history America has been the refuge of the best from all nations and from all peoples.
