HUNTER'S DREAM

The crisp fall days are upon us again and across the hedgerows a pheasant's raucous cry echos.

In the marshes and tules that border our small lakes and streams the ducks are gathering, and heard overhead is the whistling flight of the southbound geese.

This is the season of the birdshot hunter. From dawn till dusk he tramps the hills and prowls the marshes. Before the break of dawn in the morning he crawls quietly in the blind and there he lies waiting for the first rays of the sun, and shooting time.

Those of the hunter's clan who seek out the brant, the white fronted geese, the Canadian honker, and the snow goose will be crawling into strawstacks on great wheat farms of the Eastern slope, there to spend the night with the hope that in the morning the geese will be found feeding and resting to the windward of the strawstack.

The horn of the hunter has sounded and in the evenings a hunter's moon glides through the heavens. High overhead is heard the call of the southbound waterfowl and down in the orchard a pheasant is raucously calling.
