Night Fishing

Naturally, this item will have little current interest except for those who are located geographically where climate permits year-round fishing, or fishing for much later in the year than most of the United States enjoys. However, the true angler is never static, no matter how deep the snow or how bitter the climate, for his dreams, desires and imagination are always working overtime during the winter, readying plans and forays astray for the first permissible weather.

In that connection, then, this piece about night fishing may not be completely amiss.

The veteran angler knows that when darkness falls, trout which have lain dormant through the day come out on the shallows and into the still waters to feed on minnows and other trout food which usually is abroad in the evenings. Big trout especially lose their caution and boldly cruise in waters they would shun in the daylight hours. They seem to have no fear of the angler working his "night" flies or other lures from areas which he has scouted and marked during the daytime.

Some states permit night fishing until 8:30 o'clock; others until 9:30 or 10, and still others have no limit at all for the nocturnal Walton—and the angler who knows the way of a streamer fly often fills his creel with the kind of fish that put one in the "expert" class.

It seems to be a widely-accepted conclusion that the "darker the night, the better the fishing," although the writer has experienced seasons astray during bright nights which dispel this theory. It is true that on dark nights the trout seem to engage in more widespread feeding activities, feeding all over the stream or river, now and then breaking the surface with great splashes. But that is not to say that they cannot also be taken on nights when there is a moon or considerable light from the stars.

For the most successful night fishing, the angler should scout his fishing grounds in full daylight and mark well the places where he expects to stand and make his casts at night. He should even rehearse the procedure—in order to fix in his mind trees and snags which might ensnare his back casts; he should make careful note of landmarks that show up in the dark so he will not wade into water over his depth, nor run afoul of strong currents which might take him off his feet and sweep him downstream in the darkness. If he is casting with a lure on a bait-casting rod, he should look well to his reel and see that it is oiled and properly adjusted, in order that he may not have to struggle with a backlash in total darkness or under the feeble rays of a flashlight.

Best flies for night fishing are the streamers—and any of them will do, although there are scores of oldtimers who will argue vehemently that the best fly for darktime fishing is the darkest fly you can find!

Types Of Packs

There are almost as many styles of packs as there are types of tents. No pack should be worn so low that it will bore into the small of the back. Where the articles in the pack are in contact with the shoulders or back, as is the case when using a pack sack, be certain there is nothing in the pack that will press against these points and cause chafing or irritation. A good way to avoid this is to fold your blanket and put it in the pack flat against the side that will be against your body. This will act as a cushion. If the pack is equipped with leather shoulder straps, they should be kept soft, and rubbing them thoroughly with neatsfoot oil will accomplish this. Slipping the shoulder straps through a slotted, rectangular piece of sheepskin which acts as a pad against the shoulders will sometimes make them more comfortable.

The packboard or pack frame is made of either wood slats or a canvas-covered, light weight steel frame so constructed as to hold the weight away and out from the body, making it ideal in hot weather. Pack boards are fitted with shoulder straps, and have hooks or holes to accommodate the ropes used to lash load to frame. A head band may be added if desired. They are preferred by campers who must pack outfits that are too heavy, bulky or irregular to fit in a pack sack.

Hair Flies

Almost every fly fisherman knows what a hair fly is, and knows, too, that it is among the most dependable and effective of all the wet flies. There is a new variety made with deer hair, horse hair and polar bear hackles which has a translucent rib woven into the body which gives it a very lifelike appearance. You can hold this fly up to the light and the translucent rib woven into the body looks almost exactly like the larvae.
