Salvage team sinks fishing boat off Hawai'i reef

Hawai'i, the loophole carved out to support one of the state's biggest industries exempts commercial fishing boat owners from the rules enforced almost everywhere else.

The recently introduced Sustainable Fishing Workforce Protection Act would close the loophole that has allowed the Hawai'i fleet to employ the workers.

A banner reading "end slave-like labor in Hawai'i longline fishery" had been placed on the beach near the wreck by an activist from the Turtle Island Restoration Network, which has filed a complaint with the Inter-American Human Rights Commission.

Dylan Bedortha, the group's advocacy associate who set up the sign, formerly worked as a National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration observer in Hawai'i's longline fishing fleet. He said the conditions he saw on the boats as a federal employee made him change his career path.

"It took me a couple of years to really let all that sink in and see what was actually going on on some of the worst boats that I was on," Bedortha said. "I decided to take a different direction and step into the conservation side of things."

The commission is an autonomous body of the Organization of American States and works to protect human rights. The U.S. is a member.

The complaint asks the commission to determine the responsibility of the U.S. government for human-rights abuses against foreign workers in Hawai'i.

Most of the foreign workers aboard the Pacific Paradise were from Vietnam, Indonesia, the Philippines, and Kiribati, and they were not part of the regular crew.

Officials said the boat was not on a fishing trip before it crashed.

The boat is owned by Honolulu-based TWOL LLC. The company's lawyer, Bryan Ho, a longtime fishing industry attorney, has declined repeated requests for interviews.

The 20 men were at sea for at least 12 days before the vessel crashed, the minimum time it would take to get from American Samoa to Hawai'i, according to fishing industry experts.

Once rescued, they met U.S. customs officials and were escorted to a pier in Honolulu to begin work on other boats.

Another fishing vessel with foreign crew members, the 57-foot Jane, took on water and capsized about 110 miles off Hawai'i's Big Island on November 27.

The crew sent a mayday call and got into a life raft before being rescued by another fishing vessel.

U.S. foresaw a costly victory in war with North Korea — in 1994

Korea that prompted the North to attack the South, he said.

"An all-out war with North Korea, nuclear war, even if China and Russia did not enter," Perry said, "could still entail casualties approximating those of World War I or even World War II."
