THE REASON WHY

All this wheat agitation seems to most people highly technical. And what they want to know is this:

Why, if we have little more than enough wheat for ourselves, must we send about half of our total crop to the allies? Why not take enough for our home needs first and send what is left?

This question M. Hoover answers very simply. If we do not send wheat to Europe, and eat corn and oats instead, the women, children and old people of England and France will die.

Our Allies have a severe scarcity of wheat, dairy stuff, meat and sugar. Out of what provisions they have the fighting men must first be fed. This is the prime grave necessity of the war. Next, the munition workers must be well-nourished. The women at home, although most of them are doing more harder work than they did before, are making every possible sacrifice in order that their men at the front may have full rations. The burden of the scarcity will all be felt at home. This is not the time for the women to try new foods. They have neither leisure nor mental energy to spare in preparing them. They need wheat flour.

Men and women above the fighting age, those repositories of wisdom and experience whose labor and whose council are needed so much, may succumb by thousands to malnutrition.

Children, the hope of the future—children, for whom this war for democracy is being waged—may die by thousands. Indeed they are already doing so. Children need cereals and milk and butter if they are to live.

And those children who survive the pinch, who escape death from the howling gray wolf, they will yet bear all their lives in stunting, in defective development, the scars left by his teeth and claws.

For us there is plenty of food. There is abundance of corn, oats, barley and other grains. We are canning our perishables against the winter. The whole question with us is of taking a little trouble in varying our accustomed diet. There is no danger of eating too much corn meal, so long as we eat butter and fresh vegetables with it. For most Americans, the increased use of corn meal would simply mean turning a delightful, seldom-appearing luxury into a daily staple. Our country is full of food—good food—in amazing variety. But unless we send wheat to our allies, their children will die.—Albany Democrat.
