TRAVELER DESCRIBES HAWAIIAN VOLCANO

and more tropical in appearance than Oahu; there were guavas growing all the way from the wharf to the business section of Hilo, tall, shapely, vari-colored mango trees; breadfruit trees grow uncultivated everywhere, and the road to the Volcano is through a veritable fairyland of tropical jungles and forests of tree ferns, great le-le vines with their handsome large magenta flowers, entwining the trees. I saw such flowers as crimson rambler roses, double white roses, geraniums, fuchsias, lilies, daturas and pleromas, the latter a shrub with large purple flowers, that had "escaped" cultivation and were growing wild along the highways.

We got some fruit in Hilo, which was a wise provision, else I'd have been starved before we arrived at our destination.

The Volcano House is 31 miles from Hilo; we arrived about 11:30, I think, and after getting into our Volcano clothes, visiting the sulphur banks nearby, and watching the Volcano a while, it was time for lunch.

The ground all around the place is steaming from the sulphur and at intervals as sulphur blow hole. On the hotel grounds they build their tiled bath houses right over a blow hole, and one can get into a cabinet and take a fine sulphur steam bath, or if you want to save your 75 cents you can drape yourself gracefully over a blow hole and absorb as much sulphur as you like. When you come in after a long hike, or are otherwise tired out, it is the finest thing in the world to brace one up, and I can imagine how wonderful the treatments would be for anyone having skin diseases, when I rolled yards and yards of skin off me from being sunburned the week before while swimming at Kailua bay, and which hadn't even started to peel before I got into the cabinet.

Uncle Ted's Bed-Time Stories

The Wars of Today.

Ruth and Jack were playing in the house and anxiously waiting for their Uncle Ted. On this particular night he was coming to tell them about the things that happened in France a year ago and in honor of the occasion, Ruth had her French doll dressed with the Red, White and Blue, while Jack's tin soldiers, representing every branch of the allied armies were arranged in review before the open fireplace.

"Attention men!" It was Uncle Ted who burst in upon the scene. "Are the armies all set for the great celebration?"

"You bet they are," answered Jack. "Well, we will start at once. Now, let's see, I believe it was last week when you kiddies were starting for a party in celebration of the armistice that I promised to tell you what I was doing at that time last year and all about the things that have happened since. On the night before November 11, 1918, my company was occupying a part of one of the front line trenches. We were tired, muddy, hungry and homesick. We had been fighting for so many months that war seemed to be the only thing we could remember in our whole lives. That last night was a night of hard fighting, but in the morning came those wonderful orders that: 'You are informed that hostilities will cease along the whole front at 11 o'clock a. m., November 11, 1918, Paris time.' When that hour came, children, we didn't shout and yell and celebrate. We felt just like the bottom had dropped out of things. We couldn't believe that the war was ended; that we wouldn't have to fight any more, and we were so tired that all we wanted was just to sleep and rest forever."

"But we all made a lot of noise here," said Jack. "We were so happy we couldn't help it. And I remember mother cried."

"Yes, I know," continued Uncle Ted. "You folks back home felt that the whole terrible business was ended, that at last peace had come and that the soldiers would start for home. A year has passed since that date. Let us see just what has happened. Although the armies are not fighting each other on the battle fronts in France the peace that the world celebrated and welcomed with open arms is, in a great many ways, a failure."

"A failure!" exclaimed Ruth. "Yes, I know, Ruth, that sounds funny but let me show you why I say that. We have seen the government of Russia crushed and the country thrown into the hands of the bolsheviks. The German empire is a thing of the past as is the empire of Austria-Hungary. Every phase of the life of Europe has been changed. In every nation that fought against Germany a feeling of unrest exists. This is due partly to two things: labor and in which organized labor is acting. I have already told you about the strikes and what the men who have quit work are doing. Come time ago I told you about the Supreme Council that was formed by the men in Paris who made the peace treaty and how this council was supposed to take care of the troubles between the various countries until the peace treaty was really signed by all the countries politics. In our own country today the greatest danger rests in the way
