CANNING INDUSTRY BRINGS PROSPERITY.

Farmers in Oregon, and especially the Willamette valley and the country around Springfield, have the opportunity of a lifetime to plant small fruits such as loganberries, strawberries, raspberries, etc., and make most substantial returns.

The manufacturing end of farming has created world wide markets which are asking for more than the farmers are producing.

Canneries, jam factories, juice and dehydrating plants have revolutionized farming.

For years in the height of the berry seasons over production and no market was the rule. Now it is just the reverse for the factories have stabilized the price and market conditions by being able to use every pound of fruit the growers raise so that when the picking is heaviest there is no glutting of local markets as in the past.

But Springfield's market should be even better than it is at present. We should have a cannery or a dehydrating plant, or both in due time. The farmers and fruit growers should cooperate to bring one of these factories here. It would mean that they could secure the highest market price for their products without losing any depreciation of the crop from longer hauling or shipping besides being a great saving in time.

A world trade has been developed and if we are to supply it more raw material must be produced. Farm and factory must cooperate if full advantage is to be taken of the situation.
