Little-Girl, Big-Boy, and The Garden Elf
(Written for the United States School Garden Army, Department of the Interior.)

The "Humbug" and the Bee Aeroplane. Part I.

"How impolite!" Little-Girl was really shocked, as she had been taught to be considerate of other, which is the real definition of good manners.

"Well, you couldn't blame the poor little beetle. He had to have the proper food, and his mother hadn't sealed it up in his nest, as most mother insects do. He really was worse off than an orphan at an early age, and the little Elf Man leaped back in his grassy nest and fanned himself with the tip of a grass blade.

"How did you learn about him—did you follow him to the Bee-Hive?" asked Little-Girl.

"Follow him!" the Elf Man looked hurt and indignant. "Follow him—? should say not? Didn't I tell you that I knew lots of secrets?"

"What became of the beetle, and why did he have to go to the bee's home to get the right food so that he could turn into a blister beetle?" asked Little-Boy.

"Now, that," said the Elf Man, "is one of the secrets of Nature. His mother was 'born lazy. She didn't bustle and hunt around to make a nest in just the right place so that he could get the proper food. No, indeed; she laid her eggs in a field and went off and left the babies to shift for themselves. So when Tri-ung-u-lin came out into the world he climbed up a flower stalk and watched for a bee."

The little Elf scratched the end of his nose with his grass-leaf fan and looked wise.

"How did he know he had to eat bee bread?" asked Little-Girl. "I think bread and honey is nice."

"Ah, that is another of Nature's secrets. Tri-ung-u-lin knew quite as the human baby knows he has to have milk, well as that he had to take his strange ride to get his baby food. He had to find a bee. He had to ride in a bee-aeroplane or he wouldn't ever have become a blister beetle. Never at all." And the Elf Man slipped a heartsease seed into his baby morning-glory mouth.

"Does he blister you if you touch him?" asked Boy.

"Oh, no," said the Elf Man, "not at all, but the Earth Doctors catch him and his brothers and crush them into a paste and make a plaster that is put on sick people when they need to be blistered to draw some poison out of their systems. Usually," and he nodded his small head wisely, "the Earth People have done something foolish or they wouldn't be sick. They haven't followed the laws of health. And it is their own fault, for the United States Bureau of Education is willing to teach them. I am told by the Dictionary Man that there is no excuse for ignorance. Children are taught in the home and at school. Books and papers are full of kind, helpful things to make people healthy and happy. Yet some boys and girls carry millions of germs under their finger nails. You may see them through the Enchanted Glass. How terrible. It quite upsets my nerves," and the Elf Man took another heartsease seed out of his tiny pocket.

"Big-Boy had put one grimy hand behind his back. "You see, Elf Man, a boy has to use his hands for so many things and then if he digs in the garden he gets mussy, and, of course, well, you can't beatways washing your hands. It would take the skin off."

"Well, well," said the Green Elf. "I was an elf boy once upon a time and I remember that Mother Elf had a sorry time keeping me clean. I was fond of sitting on the ground to talk to the doodle bugs; they are very interesting."

"Oh, tell us about the doodle bug, little Elf Man," cried Little-Girl.

"Not today. It is a long story. But remember about blister beetle. He was once called Tri-ung-u-lin when, as a baby insect, he took a ride on the back of a bee. One branch of the family is called the oil beetle. Uncle Oil Beetle rolls over and draws in his legs and spits oil at you if you touch him. He plays dead and the oil comes out of his joints. Most useful of all is the cousin that eats the grasshoppers' eggs when he is very young and has not yet formed a taste for leaves. The grasshoppers eat the crops, you know, the Garden Manual says so, and any bug that helps destroy them is a Soldier of the School Garden Army. Of course, the blister beetles chew leaves too, and, I dare say, are something of a nuisance, but we have to remember their good deeds in helping get rid of a pest." And the Elf Man took another heartsease seed, for his throat was dry with so much talking.

"Good by, little soldiers. I must turn over and take my siesta, in other words, my afternoon nap." So he rolled over and swung high on the bough in his leaf-bag bed.

As the children went slowly back to the low white house set in the middle of the old garden they heard him snoring a tiny elfin snore.

Mrs. Linda Harrod Endorses Chamberlain's Tablets.

"I suffered for years with stomach trouble and tried everything I heard of but the only relief I got was temporary until last spring I saw Chamberlain's Tablets advertised and procured a bottle of them from our druggist. I got immediate relief from that dreadful heaviness and pain in the stomach after eating. Since taking two bottles I can eat anything I want without distress," writes Mrs. Linda Harrod, Ft. Wayne, Ind.
