What will become of all the "Brownsville woolen mill store", if the Brownsville woolen factory starts up again, as it is threatening to do?

If the turkeys are not "roasting high" this Thanksgiving season, the prices are.

We shall be glad to record next week, the death of every turkey slaughtered to make Thanksgiving cheer for any of the readers of the News. If you could not afford turkey report it to us if you killed a rooster, or a hen or a goose, especially if you asked any of your neighbors in to help you eat it.

A friend of the News, who is not versed in diplomatic language, wants to know what the head of the Japanese delegation meant when he said: "We accept the Chinese proposals as the basis of discussion." His idea is that it meant: "We agree that that is what we shall quarrel about." He may be right about that. Who can explain it to him?

There seems to be a general recognition, among the delegates to the disarmament conference, of Japan's need of expansion. China's view of the matter seems to be about like this: "We know that Japan needs more land, and we are perfectly willing that she shall have it, provided she gets it from somebody else.

THE POOR ARMENIANS

The disarmament conference does not wholly fill the place of a peace conference. In all the discussions concerning the settlement of disturbing questions in "the far east," nobody has yet come forward with a proposition to save the remnant of the poor, harried, tortured Armenians. The Turkish nationalists on the south and west are against them, the Russians bolsheviks on the northeast are against them, and the Kurds on the east are against them and against everybody else. To relieve them would probably mean to make war, and war is outside of the scope of the work of the conference. So the Armenians the greatest sufferers whose cases we have before us, will probably be sacrificed to our desire for peace.

WHEN BEGGARS RIDE

Tramps used to really tramp. That is, they moved from place to place over the country, generally along the railroad tracks, on foot, or rode on the brake-beams or in box cars. Now it is a common thing to see them riding boldly on the tops of the freight cars, sometimes in groups of half-a-dozen. Close observers say that, because the number of the troublesome unemployed is so great the railroad managers generally consider it to be the least trouble to let them ride and thus keep them moving; and that they give orders to that effect, or pass down the word to the trainmen to wink at the practice. Perhaps the rest of us are paying their fare, after all. That may explain why your fare, on your last few trips, as nearly as you could average it up, seemed to foot up about 3.675 cents a mile.

THE KAISER'S THOUGHTS

It would be interesting to know something of the feelings with which the Kaiser, in his lonely exile in Holland, listens to the echoes of the disarmament conference, the expressions coming from the representatives of the enlightened nations of the world of the horror and detestation of the acts which he initiated in his attempt at world conquest, and the general expression of determination that "it must not happen again." He is probably not prepared to appreciate the sentiments of the masses of the world in their protest against the brutalities of war as he practiced it, nor the force of the uprising against it. He certainly cannot take much pleasure in the thought that he contributed more than any other living person to bring all this about.

CHINA'S CASE

For half a century or more the policy of the more highly civilized nations of the world towards China has been something like this—with the exception of the United States, which would be generally regarded as about as highly civilized as any of them. One would say to another: "I will take this piece of the Chinaman's land, and cultivate it for my own benefit. This shall be my 'sphere of influence'. You can take that piece and the other man can take another. The Chinaman shall pay all of his domestic expenses out of the proceeds of what is left, if he can. If he falls behind in his obligations to us, we will take some more of his land, to make sure that he meets them; and so on, as long as there is any of it left."

China's series of ten proposals to the arms conference can be boiled down into these three: First, the Chinese shall be allowed to hold their own land, and cultivate it for their own benefit. Second, the Chinese neighbors shall not mortgage any part of the Chinese land to themselves for any improvements which they propose to make, unless the Chinese agrees to the improvements and agrees to the mortgage. Third, if any of the Chinese neighbors hold a consultation to decide upon the disposition of any part of the Chinese land or the regulation of any of his affairs, the Chinese shall be informed of the meeting, and shall be allowed to be present.

On the face of things, China's proposals would seem to most people to be reasonable.
