

SHARP ANSWER IS MADE TO DEMAND SENT BY ENEMY

Drama was at its height in the world war when Lieut.-Col. Charles Whittlesey, commanding the Lost Battalion, is reputed to have told the German forces to "Go to Hell." Whittlesey's defiance came in answer to the enemy's demand that he surrender his position. It is portrayed in faithful detail in the film "The Lost Battalion," which is to be shown at the Bell Theater Monday and Tuesday March 9 and 10, for the benefit of the American Legion.

Colonel Whittlesey and Captain George McMurtry read the letter which was delivered by one of their own men who had been captured. It had been penciled by Lieutenant Heinrich Prinz of the German army, who before the war had spent six years in Seattle. The German officer appealed to the Americans to surrender on the grounds of humanity, saying that the moans of the suffering Americans in the Argonne "pocket" could be heard in the enemy lines, that further resistance was vain and that rescue was impossible.

A white flag was to be shown if the Americans wished to accept and surrender. The answer was an order from Colonel Whittlesey to take down even the white cloth panels which marked his position for his own airplanes. Doing that, he deliberately cut the last link connecting him with the American forces from whom he had become separated when his battalion pressed on and carried its objectives while supporting units were unable to stand the pace. He cut that link, the Yanks held on, relief came.

Novel Lamp Hammered Out

A novel lamp, resembling a big gun shell is on display at the Anderson Motor company. The lamp was designed and made by Henry Schwint, Jr., of Marcola, and is made from a piece of seamless brass tubing to represent a three inch fifty caliber shell.

The design on the lamp was first drawn on paper and then traced on the shell. It was then hammered on, a filling of lead in the tube making this possible. The flange on the bottom of the lamp and the projectile were made from a brass bar. Three lights are attached to the projectile.

All tools necessary for the work are kept in a small Prince Albert tobacco car, with the exception of two small hammers and a sand-bag.

PICTURE PLAYERS LOST IN SIERRA NEVADA MOUNTAINS

History has a habit of repeating itself!
In 1846-47 Donner and his ill-fated party became lost in the high Sierra Nevada.

William Farnum, starring in "The Man Who Fights Alone," returned to Hollywood after being lost in the same range for a week with Lois Wilson, Edward Horton, Director Wallace Worsley and a party of over thirty persons.

They were lost at least as far as the Paramount studio was concerned. They left to take location scenes. When they did not return on schedule, apprehension was felt.

It transpired that, after traveling eighty miles over precipitous mountain trails, the party found the lake practically dry. Not to be stumped by the mere vanishing of a lake Worsley took the whole party back over the mountains, crossed the Sacramento Valley and pushed on up past Truckee and Donner Lake to Tahoe, the most beautiful lake in Southern California.

Thousands of Americans who have visited this wonder spot will live over again its beauties in the screen presentation of "The Man Who Fights Alone," which is Farnum's first starring picture for Paramount, coming Friday and Saturday at the Bell Theatre.
