In Confidence By Flo

Dear Miss Flo:

My husband, whom I love very much—in a sane, normal manner—is a decided flirt. I knew when I married him that he could not—or would not resist a pretty face, but of course, I married him with the idea that he would settle down and that we were going to live happily ever after.

Now, after several years of married life, I actually believe he is getting worse. The moment he enters a room, he glances around, picks out the prettiest girl, and immediately proceeds to establish a delightful friendship. It has always seemed very harmless to me. I knew that I had his love and we were always happy, so I have laughed and joked about his various affairs, and while it did hurt my pride considerably, I pretended to think it most natural, and quite amusing. At present he is engaged in a new affair which seems more serious than the others. She is as much a flirt as my husband. I can stand a lot, but I cannot stand the pity of my friends. It humiliates me. They tell me that I am foolish to take it so good naturedly, and that the only way I can break it up is to show him that two can play at the same game. That sort of revenge strikes me as being cheap. Still, I want my husband, and I am prepared to go any limit to hold him. Please advise me.

Louise.

Judging from the number of women who follow the course of action which your friends have outlined for you, I suppose that it must be the natural course for the injured wife to take. I believe that the result is always the same—quarrels, separation and finally divorce.

When a woman makes up her mind to show her husband that she can play at the same game, she usually means that he is doing wrong, she will too, and two wrongs have never yet made a right.

Unfortunately, marriage in no way changes a man's nature. Men who philander during the engagement period will do it after marriage. If he is at heart nothing more than a philanderer, you have nothing much to worry about because as he really knows the woman, his interest wanes. When the wife finds that her husband admires another woman, she should try to find out just what he admires about her. She will call on her, invite her to their home, and see that her husband sees so much of her in his own home that he will soon tire.

Of course, I realize that the above action is not easy. It is very difficult. If the wife remains cool and sane, however, when the marriage starts to break, there is some hope of saving it. If she makes up her mind to do these things the chances are that in the end she will develop many tactful qualities—and many other admirable qualities.

I believe that you have acted very wisely by not treating the affairs seriously. That is probably the reason they have never been serious. Your friends that advise you to show him that two can play at the same game would be the first to criticize you when you began flirting. Up to that moment you will have their sympathy, but as soon as you began flirting, comment will change.

If you will glance around you will find that the ideal marriages are few. You may not find perfect happiness, but you will find a degree of happiness that you will not find by the other method, and certainly it is much to be preferred.

All Around Our Neighborhood

There's more than one way to handle these youngsters

IT'S no easy job trying to bring up young daughters these days. Mrs. Burns ought to know—she has three of them. And last summer she worried dreadfully—all the young people going on long auto rides after night. So this spring she rummaged around in the garret and barn and unearthed some old chairs and a table or two and a porch swing they hadn't had up for years. Then she got some Acme Quality Enamel-Kote and copied some painted furniture she had seen in town—the prettiest pale green with decorations in lavender and pink and blue—and made a lot of retonne cushions. Then she painted some old porch boxes and filled them with ferns from the woods and bought some new records for the phonograph. I wish you could see all the boys flock down there now. It begins to look as if she wouldn't be able to keep the girls at home after all—they say Gertrude is engaged already.
