Sweet corn may be had throughout the Oregon season by planting varieties which mature at different times, the experiment station reports. Good gardeners in many sections are using Portland Market and Golden Bantam, and very often a variety for all use called Howling Mob. Much better yields are to be had by having the sweet corn plot as nearly square as possible. This provides better pollination and consequent better yields.

The black gooseberry borer, occurring as a large white grub in the roots and crown of the plants, appears to be rather widely distributed in Oregon and is seriously injurious on many of the plantings, the experiment station has learned. Growers about to plant gooseberries should examine carefully their stock and take every precaution to avoid infested bushes.

Dr. S. Ralph Dippel, Dentist, Vitus building, Springfield, Oregon.
