In Confidence By Flo

Dear Miss Flo:—

I wonder if you will help me? I am a girl twenty-six years old. I have been going with a man several years older than myself for two years. He gave me an engagement ring for Christmas. However, he seems in no especial hurry to get married. He rarely speaks of it and has never mentioned any definite plans, although he often speaks of the little home we will have some day. That some day seems to be far in the distance, and as I am no longer a young girl, I am wondering if I am foolish to be giving so much of my time to this one man. I love him very much, and perhaps I show it too plainly. Do you think a man's love increases or decreases when he finds that a girl loves him? I know that he is the head of his family, supporting his widowed mother and his two sisters. Of course, I admire him for his loyalty, but it really isn't necessary for him to support his sisters. They both have a fairly good education, and both old enough and healthy enough to support themselves. What shall I do?

Madge.

I don't believe that anything is quite so wearing on a man and woman as a long engagement. It is wearing because it isn't natural, and it gets upon the nerves of both. It is the best little love-killer I know. You haven't the privileges of a husband and wife, nor the liberty of the single man and woman.

Any man who knows that he is not in a position to marry for years to come should not take up a girl's time. If he is honorable, he will explain the situation to the girl, and if she is wise, she will not let herself be drawn into keeping company with a man she knows is not in position to marry her—at least not for years to come. A girl's time for making a good marriage is while her youth and beauty shine, and she should make the best of it. That period is short and she takes a chance if she gives it to a man who may grow tired of her before he is in position to marry.

Whether or no a man's love increases or decreases with the knowledge that a girl loves him, depends entirely on the man. A vain man is flattered by the knowledge that a girl loves him. He has such a lot of respect and admiration for her superior taste and her excellent judgement that he marries her. Other girls have saved the day with tears when the man of her choice tried to break away from her. He sympathized with her so deeply for losing such a fine man that it was more than he could stand, so he married her.

Most men, however, prefer to do the courting. I have agreed deal of faith in the indifferent treatment. As soon as the average man finds that he is being pursued, rather than pursuing, he loses interest. It requires a great deal of tact to handle the sex that has never lost the hunter instinct. If she is wise the girl will not ask when he is going to see her again, if she wants to keep his interest.

Of course, the role of indifference should not be carried too far. It must not be obvious or played blatantly, because there is a lot of competition about these days.

As your young man doesn't seem in any particular hurry about naming a wedding date, I should think the best thing for you to do is to try the indifference role, and along with it, try going out with other boys. If it is a question as to whether or not he could support a wife, and he were really anxious to get married, he would insist that his sisters find positions and support themselves. If he really cares for you, and wants to marry you, he will very quickly decide what he is going to do when he thinks he is going to lose you. You have already given him two years of your life, and if he doesn't intend to get married, now is the time to break.
