POWER COMPANIES NEED FREE HAND TO EXPAND

An illy-informed public is the only danger threatening the development of the electric industry today, to the discerning mind of Guy E. Tripp, president of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing company.

"If our power companies," he declared, "were to be subjected to treatment similar to that accorded the railroads, electrical development would be hampered by restricting private initiative and drying up the sources of capital for new work, and the chief losers in the long run would be the people themselves."

"I am certain," Mr. Tripp continued, "that no method for carrying out electrical development can be more effective than the one we are now employing, namely, private enterprise under public regulation."

"But this method is being threatened from two different directions—by the advocates of government ownership, and those who seek to confine their power development within certain narrow lines laid down by anticipatory legislation."
