FARMERS TO GROW FLAX SEED IN THIS DISTRICT

Flax seed growing promises to become an industry in this district as a result of a visit of E. H. Smith, field representative of the Portland Linseed Oil works, who was the office of County Agent O. S. Fletcher this week. The Portland plant has a capacity of half a million bushels of flax seed a year, and as only 5000 bushels are raised in the state, an effort is being made to induce farmers to raise flax seed for the Portland consumption.

The proposed crop is not fibre flax such as is grown at Salem and discussed as an industry, but is a finer and more remunerative crop, it is said. The Portland company will pay $2.52 per bushel or 41.2 cents a pound or will give in exchange 37 pounds of linseed meal for every bushel of seed at one-half the price per pound that the company pays for flax.

Mr. Smith pointed out the opportunity for Oregon growers in the fact that two and a half million bushels of flax are used on the coast every year.

Among farmers who considered growing flax and tentatively decided to do so were Cal M. Young of Willamette and S. A. Peauuk and T. E. Steno of this district.

GREENHOUSE PLANTS NOW NEED TO BE REPOTTED

Oregon house plants and greenhouse plants may be repotted any time this month. Although some plants do well if not repotted for 2 years, most of them need it now.

To repot them, hold the pot, with the plant in it, upside down and in the right hand. Knock the top of the pot on a shelf or ledge, holding the plant between the fingers of the other hand and just above the earth ball. When the earth ball falls out, remove as much soil as possible without breaking the roots.

Repot in the same size pot or one inch larger, suggests Andrew Laing, superintendent of the college greenhouses. The finger tips, a pencil or a small stick may be used in firming the soil. If the plant is firmed well, especially around the roots, it will not be so much affected by the change.
