PERSONAL EFFICIENCY—DEPENDENT ON HEALTH

(By State Board of Health)

The principles of efficiency are but the findings of science applied with plain common sense to the every day affairs of the work-a-day world. Efficiency is nothing more than getting the best results in the quickest time with the least expense of material, money, effort and energy. In other words, it is doing the right thing, the right way, at the right time, and thus getting right results. Personal efficiency is the accumulated results obtained from the formation of good habits, of logical thinking, prompt and persistent action, and the maintenance of health by obedience to the simple and inexorable laws of nature. Personal efficiency is dependent upon and proportional to the degree of health one enjoys. It is quite true that there are many men who are efficient in spite of the handicap of poor health, but the output of these men would be even more marvelous if their health were improved. If a man wishes to enjoy life through efficiency, he must give his health proper consideration. Health is not the product of good fortune, but the dividend paid to those who invest in habits of serenity, correct eating, rest, recreation, repose and hard work. Energy must be conserved and every action of the body should coordinate with all the faculties and with full mental powers. The secret of the tremendous accomplishment of successful men is their well laid plans for each day.

The recognition of human inefficiency has led to the discovery of causes of inefficiency and the development of methods for their prevention. The greatest cause of human inefficiency and unhappiness is ill health. Few individuals can be considered perfect specimens of physical and mental health. Almost everyone has a defect of varied importance, such as poor posture, defective teeth, impaired vision, and diseased tonsils. Some will be found to have more serious defects such as heart, kidney and lung diseases. The economic loss from disease and ill health is appalling. Over two and one-half million of the people of the United States are continually ill at the present time. At least one-half of the diseases are preventable by proper preventive measures. The human mechanism needs intelligent care and an annual inventory to insure its well being. The annual inventory should consist of a thorough health examination.

A health examination is a thorough physical and mental appraisal of an individual, made by a competent doctor of medicine in order to detect physical and mental impairment and faulty habits of hygiene with a view to their correction. The reasons why health examinations are beneficial are so obvious that hardly any argument for them is necessary. They are of course advantageous to the individual in that they serve to detect the beginning of organic disease, or discover the existence of definite physical impairments of which the person may have been unaware. Faulty personal habits of living, errors of hygiene, and possibly shortcomings in environmental conditions are frequently brought out. For instance, the routine examinations of a large number of persons brings out the fact that 80 per cent have had mechanical use of the body, or faulty posture. The secret in combating disease, in most cases, lies in early diagnosing. The diagnosis at the very onset will often check the disease. Therefore, health examinations have a real place in increasing human efficiency.
