waved this aside, as I knew that honor and integrity were part of his fine character which I had grown to know intimately from my association with him in the shop.

The late afternoon sun fell in slanting rays through the panes of leaded glass. I crowned Thankful's soft hair with an aureole of light.

"Look, a Saint Cecilia!" the young Cossack nodded to where Thankful sat, in proud dignity, wearing her new-found love, and walking over he placed his lips very gently against the spot of dancing gold. It was truly a gesture of one who had been born close to the throne. I turned away and so engrossed were they in their mutual admiration that they did not know when I had gone. "Curtis?" we sat looking over Shades Mountain where a group of bright stars did a saraband for the benefit of a pale, thin moon that hung by a gossamer thread in a muted violet sky.

"Yes, Sweetheart."

I had just finished telling him the story of Thankful and Captain T.

"It certainly is a good thing that these lovers are going to relieve me of that shop."

"Yes, I know. You were tired of it, weren't you dear?"

"Uh-huh, but that wasn't all." I couldn't have gone on, even if I'd wanted to. "I put my head against his shoulder. 'Curtis, can't you guess?'"

He tilted my face up toward him with both his hands and gazed deep into my eyes.

"My darling!" he whispered. "is it, can it be?"

"Yes, it is and can be." I smiled, as I mimicked his confusion. "and I do hope it will be a son, Curtis. Just like you."

"Oh, no," he replied. "that would never do. IT MUST be a girl!" Then he sat in silence for a moment, gazing into the night.

"Listen, precious," he finally said. "I'm going to make a wish over my left shoulder on the new moon and you know that never fails." He turned and his voice was low with meaning, like a man saying his prayers. "Dear God," his eyes were closed, "please send us a little girl. JUST like Sallie. Because you see, Sir, she's the most perfectly wonderful person in all the world."

THE END.
