For cleaning up wilt-infected potato stock in Oregon fields the three-plan method of roguing is recommended as the most rapid, in a report by M. B. McKay of the experiment station. This method is best used with a seed plot, by means of which wilt control can be had with the least trouble and labor.

Application of stomach poisons to plants for insect control has come to be regarded in Oregon as most satisfactory in dust form, says the experiment station entomologist. Dust sticks to slick-leaved plants such as cabbage better than liquid, covers the entire surface more evenly and seems to burn tender foliage less. It may be applied through a coarse sack or cheesecloth bag, but a preferable way is by means of a commercial type of duster.

Pollination of Etterberg strawberries 121 by interplanting of other varieties had no more effect on the crop than self-pollination, in tests conducted by Oregon growers and the experiment station. Barrenness of some of the terminal blossoms was ascribed to defective structure of the pistils.
