What Price Beauty?

by Miss Flo

MARRIAGES MADE IN HEAVEN, BUT—

Dear Miss Flo—
Why must marriage be so monotonous? I really am crazy about my husband—but I am becoming sick and weary of the domestic drudgery and the deadly sameness of the routine existence. My husband is indifferent and never pays the slightest bit of attention nor shows the slightest bit of affection—although I know he does care for me. He finds fault with everything I do—and never gives me a word of praise for anything.
I think it is most discouraging.
J. K.

A young English humorist once said that marriages are made in heaven—and most of them marred on the honeymoon. His advice as to the perfect remedy was rather drastic. He said, "don't marry."
Without question, marriage turns out to be a cruel and bitter disappointment to nine out of every ten women who enter into it. It may also be a disappointment to their husbands, but it is especially disillusioning to women because they have gone into it with such optimistic high hopes and blind faith that they will find it the perfect paradise on earth.
And regardless of how good the marriage might be—it is never the exquisitely perfect thing the women expect it to be. It might even be better—in a saner, more normal manner, but all the same, it isn't the dream, and therefore it isn't a perfect marriage.
It is almost impossible to believe, but it is true, that in face of her lifelong opportunity to observe the daily life her mother has led, and the domestic drudgery in the homes of friends and neighbors, every girl honestly believes that her own marriage will be a perpetual honeymoon, and that the man she marries will remain her ardent lover of her courtship days.
Of course she is doomed to disappointment, and when she realizes that she has let herself in for the usual lot, and when she has to put her hands and her resources to the routine labor of making her family comfortable, for which she gets neither appreciation nor a pay check, when she has to contend with a husband who seems to have cornered the market on the whole supply of crabiness, it naturally gets on her nerves and she feels like throwing up the job.

Perhaps the best advice that one could offer these unhappy wives is to try to forget what they expected of marriage and make the best of the bargain. Place on the credit side of the book the value of your home and your security and your settled position in society, and realize that you are not as badly off as you think you are, for the law of compensation always holds true. Life is a series of compromises, and if we don't get the best, we are very foolish to throw away the second best. The wise woman will get the best of what she has, when she finds her marriage a failure so far as romance and thrills are concerned.
