FARM REMINDERS

Growing pullets that are roosting and fully feathered will do better when they are moved from the brooderhouse to a free range, reports the extension service. Under average Oregon conditions pullets can be moved when they are 10 weeks of age.

Trying to save a few dollars in fuel for the brooderhouse, may result in lower vitality of the chicks, a high death rate from crowding in the corners and a low winter production, states the Oregon extension service. On warm days it is better to give chicks more ventilation than to turn the heat off.

Chicks grow new feathers and lose their old coat when three weeks old. Some chicks are almost naked at that time and only a thin membrane separates the lungs from the outside air. When insufficient brooderheat is supplied, says the Oregon Extension service, there is great danger of pneumonia.

Ultra violet rays prevent rickets in growing stock. It is advisable to get chicks out in the yards in the sun rays as soon as the weather permits.

Granulated bone and limestone are valuable additions to regular mineral supplements of charcoal, hard quartz, grit and oyster shell. Oyster shell is best when only one shell material is fed.

Dates of the convention of the committee of 100 prune growers to be held at the Oregon Agricultural college have been changed from June 23 and 29 to May 31 and June 1 in order to avoid conflict with the special state election called for June 25, according to an announcement issued today by the college extension service.

Delegates to the convention have been chosen from Washington, Polk, Linn, and Benton counties and similar action will be taken in Douglas, Lane, Marion and Clackamas, Oregon and Clark county, Washington.

The convention is to meet to formulate definite plans for coping with problems of the prune industry.

FACTORIES ARE MOVING WESTWARD VERY RAPIDLY

Fourteen states showed a net increase in the number of factories between the federal census years of 1923 and 1925, and ten of these fourteen are west of the Mississippi river. Every Pacific coast state registered gain during the two years. California leading the entire country with 490 plants, Mississippi was second, Alabama third and Washington was fourth with 208 factories. The total gains for the east were 32, for the south 1002 of which 818 were in Alabama and Mississippi, and for the west 927 of which 794 were in Washington, Oregon and California.

In contrast with the increase shown by the western states, the 1925 census summaries show that every New England state and every Great Lakes state registered losses. New York lost 4,698 factories in two years; Pennsylvania 1,695, Wisconsin 555, New Jersey 547.

The increase of 298 in the number of factories credited to the state of Washington for the two-year period covered by the last government census does not tell the whole story, as the smaller plants are not included in the enumeration. During this period the Manufacturers' Association of Washington recorded 316 new factories, without regard to size.

Transportation, markets, power and operating conditions on the Pacific coast are the magnetic factors directing the forces of manufacturing toward the rim of the Pacific on whose waters the world's greatest commercial achievements are yet to be summated.
