Transfer Steeds Show Sudden Burst of Spirit

In a thrilling demonstration belonging more to the roads of 1907 than the auto-traveled thoroughfares of 1927, the team of Nathan Gay, veteran transfer man of this city, were carried away in a sudden burst of spirit last Friday and before they were brought to a stop had wrecked the top and otherwise damaged the familiar wagon which they had pulled listlessly over Springfield streets for years.

It was while they were left standing near Second and C streets on Friday afternoon that the horses, becoming frightened or otherwise stimulated to action, suddenly took off at a gallant gait in the direction of Main street.

Galloping at their best speed, the steeds swept up Second street to the intersection with Main. So far, their minds had been one and the same, but at the corner a disastrous variation in decision took place.

One of the horses apparently had every intention of continuing on Second street. The other, probably yielding to a habit of years standing, turned into Main street. Being hitched to the wagon together, such conflicting intentions could have none but disastrous results.

While wagon and harness strained, the two were forced to accept a compromise course, which was on an oblique line leading directly into the front entrance of Archambeau's millinery store, erstwhile headquarters of the First National bank.

The high curb of the sidewalk at that point, however, proved a stumbling block in the way of the evident destiny of the rampant horses which would have landed them well inside of the millinery store. One of them fell down.

The animal flopped square in the entrance of the millinery store. Stumbling groggily to its feet, after knocking a nick from one of the bricks in the wall of the building, this horse then joined the other in carrying the demonstration into the center of town where all could see.

At that moment, Cecil Mathes, who, with Jack Larsen, had been watching the event open-mouthed, swung into action. With bravery befitting a hero, he rushed into the street, and grasped the bridle of one of the nags. Throwing his weight into the effort, Mathes managed, after hauling and calling for half a block to stop the wild-eyed team in front of the library building. Thus ended what may be the last runaway Springfield will ever witness.

A wrenched axle, wrecked top, and other damage was done to the aged wagon, which stood dejectedly in its battered condition as Mr. Gay rode up in Dr. W. H. Pollard's sedan automobile. The manner of arrival of the transfer man, in itself, indicated the progress this old world is experiencing.
