WINTER WHEAT DOING WELL IN OREGON

Latest advices from the Eastern Oregon and Washington wheat belt are to the effect that winter grain never looked more promising than it does at present. This includes the country from The Dalles eastward. The Inland Empire received a generous supply of moisture during the winter and early spring, thus fitting the ground for a vigorous growth of vegetation to be sustained throughout the ripening period. Taken in connection with the serious wheat failure in many parts of the world, as generally reported, an expected large crop in Oregon and Washington will be especially profitable and fratifying.

Canadian Crop Situation

The Farmers' Sun of Toronto says: "Everything is extremely backward for this time of year. Reports as to seeding vary greatly. In some districts early sown fields are showing green, while in others, particularly in the eastern counties, seeding of spring grain has not even started. Not much improvement is noted in the fall wheat situation, but clovers and alfalfa are looking a lot better than a week ago, although the percentage of winter killed will run very high. Pastures are poor all over and most cattle remain stabled."

Heavy Crop of Berries

Word from various points throughout western Oregon is that weather conditions are favorable for development of an excellent grade of strawberries and indications are that there will be a very heavy crop this season. An agent of the Pacific Fruit Express company recently said that the fruit and vegetable outlook in the northwest is brighter than it has been in years. His company is building two thousand new refrigerator cars.
