Red Hair and Blue Sea

Several drops of rain fell.
Van agreed. "But there's a squall coming," he said. "I'll run back first for umbrellas."

As he turned away she hesitated, unexpectedly afraid at being left alone.

But as she moved forward a Japanese policeman, saluting benignly, reassured her. And she saw every step brought her nearer those two representatives of the civil and the moral law, which lay at anchor beyond the wharf, the Okayama and that Iju Ran which is the latest, perhaps the last, of the Morning Stars in which the American missionaries have carried the Word.

The old woman's house was not only conspicuous in location but in appearance. The thatches of this island were rectangular, sharp roofed, sided with waven tat, narrow doored. But this hut was oval and open—vaguely the architecture of central Polynesia.
The girl stooped to enter, then drew back in one of those sudden apprehensions that still beset her. Who knew where Ponape Burke would strike? This house seemed safe; might indeed be safer than the mission. But yet . . .

She peered in; saw only three old women. No one could be in hiding, none approach without being seen.
Palmyra entered, advanced toward the central posts, glanced interestedly around.

Suddenly, something dropped past her eyes, and the three old women hurled themselves at her.

So unexpected the attack from such as these, in an open shed such as this, at almost the settlement's busiest and most public spot, that the girl was caught unready. And before she could move a muscle, cry out, her throat was compressed—a terrible, choking pressure. She fought for breath. Then, her arms pinioned, came relief and a fierce warning: "No 'peakey, no 'peakey!" At the moment of the on-fall her guide, still behind her, had dropped round her throat a fibre loop, a brutal tourniquet with which she could, instantly, be strangled into silence—or death.

Grove People Here—Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Parker of Cottage Grove and her daughter, Mrs. Vern Stewart of Netf, were here last week-end on business.
