TIGER TRAIL

betrayal, the very look of her softened me.

I found young Southley sitting before a little fire in the library, and he called to me as I passed. In spite of the warmth of the night, the little flame looked hospitable and kindly.

"Heavens, what a night!" he exclaimed. "I suppose you've heard about—the tiger?"

"Of course, I know the legend. Anything new?"

"Hasn't old Hayward told you? He and my father have been out talking to the servants, just a little while ago. He's quite an old beast, you know. Well, the colored people say he is walking again tonight."

"Nice little thing to think about as I drop to sleep," I suggested.

"Isn't it? We have an old gardner that we call Mose. Mose was in town today, and he came back riding a horse about eleven o'clock. Rather it was somewhat before eleven, because you and the older Hayward were out on the golf green for your late evening walk."

"Go on," I urged. "Mose was riding home. I suppose he saw the ghost-tiger floating through the air, or riding a broomstick—"

"Nothing quite so bizarre as that, I'm sorry to say. Maybe I talk lightly, but I'm feeling rather serious. Long if our tiger had done nothing except ride a broom, or fly, or something, it would have been a good legend to tell our children—and toast to in good vintage. But unfortunately—our tiger took other ways of manifesting himself. All he did was frighten Mose's horse—and leave his track in the earth."

"The man spoke wholly without emotion. He smiled a little, too—a rather wan, hopeless smile that was singularly upsetting to the spirit."

"His track!" I echoed. "You don't mean that?"

"He saw a great yellow and black cat—almost as large as a pony. But that isn't quite all. Mose kept his head. He told himself it was a delusion, just as you and I have told ourselves many times. So he controlled his horse; then looked down at the monlit road. It was covered with dust, and he could see very plainly. And he saw—just what I told you."

"I spoke very quietly.

"Tracks?"

"Yes—as big as his two hands, clear across the road. He wanted to take father and the Haywards and I down to see them. I think all of us except father, who is rather old for such excursions, were going—but something has evidently diverted them. They were to meet me here."

"I suppose the rain has spoiled them now."

"Weakened them, anyway. Of course, the colored people are terrified. The night the tiger first went wild was just on such a night as this—in the middle of the storm. They say on such nights as these—he likes to come back into the warm, dry house, and play in the curtains."

In a few minutes more we were out where the rain beat upon us. The road was already washed with water. It didn't seem possible that if there had really been mysterious tracks in the dust, that they could have endured the storm.

"I've got some fine plans for tomorrow—if it just clears up," the youth told me joyously as we tramped up the road. I think he was trying to divert his mind, as well as mine, from the business at hand.

"I'm sorry, Ernest, I told him. 'I'm going home tomorrow.'

He stopped in his tracks, and I urged him on.

"Going home? Good Lord, Why? I thought you'd stay to see us through. Of course, I can't blame you—"

"I've got to make a living," I told him lightly. "It's time I went to work."

"But you were going to stay a full week—and you promised sis last night you would make it ten days or two weeks."

"Did she tell you that?"

"Tell me? I should say she did. She danced a highland fling."

It didn't make the scene of the hour before any more pleasant to remember. She had seemed glad when I had told her that I had postponed my departure. And even now Ernest's words filled me with a strange, soaring gladness that I tried to fight off. She had proved the hour before how much she really cared. She belonged to Vilas, not me, in spite of the fact that she had been ready to kill him when I opened the door of the den. I remembered every smile—each had been an epoch—every softness in her dark eyes, every tremor of her lips.

We tramped through the downpour, and soon we came to the point that the negro had described. Then we began to search about with the lanterns. It must have made a strange picture—the distant lightning, the glowing lanterns, our own tall figures in the yellow raincoats. The great house was dark behind us.

Val N. Tine: "Queer bird, Goofy."
Hal O. Ween: "Say, he's so nutty that every time a clock cuckoo he things he's being paged."
"Thish," inhaled the village drunk, as he fizzed through the old home brew, "ish shertainly a (hic) town."
