TIGER TRAIL

struck in the hall below us, so softly we could hardly hear.

"Let's go to bed," I whispered. "Evidently the walk is done."

"Be patient, old man." Then he uttered the strangest little sigh. "Look, Long. It isn't done, after all."

His voice dropped a note; that was its only change. I knew he was pointing toward the row of windows at the opposite end of the hall. Three of them glowed dimly from the flickering lightning in the far reaches of the sky, rectangular in shape as they should be. The upper part of the fourth was lighted too, but the lower part was wholly obscured by something that stood in front. It was something low and long that stood perhaps three feet high. Something was crossing at the end of the hall, between us and the windows.

The shadows slowly changed in shape. It made an arc over the lower part of the same window we had seen before—a shape as of a monstrous flank of an animal. And the adjoining window was partly obscured now. Whatever moved at the end of the hall was creeping slowly past the windows, and its body was long enough that it left dark umbrages against two of the lighted panes.

There was no chance for a mistake. My senses were perfectly alert. It was not a delusion or an effect of shadows. Both of us kept our self-control and were rather surprisingly calm.

"Can you hit at that range?" Ernest whispered in my ear.

"I can, but I don't dare. I can't shoot at a shadow, Ernest. Too great a chance for accidents."

"Then we'll stalk it. It doesn't pay to wait any more, Long. Anything is better than this suspense."

We stepped out of our hiding place and crept down the hall. All four of the windows were clear in outline now. Our quarry had headed on, evidently into the corridor that ran at right angles to the main hall.

But Ernest spoiled our chances of stalking the creature in the hall. We ot to the windows and made the turn. Both of us knew, as well as we knew that the rain was clattering on the roof, that the creature we hunted was close in the darkness somewhere in front of us. We were trying to walk with utter silence. Ernest a pace or two in front. He forgot about a little step at the turn in the corridor.

He tripped and even above the roar of the rain the sound was distinct. The floor shook—and it seemed to me that I heard the impact of cushioned feet as our quarry leaped. But I can't be sure of that. The imagination is known to play tricks. Perhaps there was a faint rustle and stir.

"Quick!" my companion breathed. "It will escape us!"

We started running down the hall. It was a tremendously long corridor, stretching almost the breadth of the great house; and it seemed folly to try to overtake those swift feet. And completely at the end Hayward's door suddenly flung open.

Both of us knew in a single instant that we would get a sight of the thing as it crossed the open doorway. Hayward had many candles in his room, and some of their light flung out into the hall. But there was hardly time to receive the thought, much less to act. There was no time whatever to raise a pistol. Our quarry was a long way in front of us; and the door was scarcely wide open before it passed in front.

Of course, it was too far to see plainly. But I had no more delusions about its reality. The disease that afflicted the old manor house was surely drawing to its crisis.

The creature we saw fitted with disturbing consistency into the old legend of the mansion. The form was low and long, and although the light was dim its general color was perfectly visible to both of us. It was a rich, beautiful yellow, striped with black. There were no extenuating circumstances. Both of us saw it—as plain as we saw the open doorway. The posture was exactly that of a great cat creeping, with belly low hung, upon its prey.

Neither of us stopped. I don't think either of us cried out. We simply raced on up the hall. Even then there might have been a chance of overtaking the creature if it had not been for Hayward's interference. He flung out of the door as we went past and seized me by the shoulders. "Good God! Did you see it?" he cried. "Didn't you see, man? It went past my door."

The candle light was on his face; and the look was one not quickly forgotten. His ruddy color was quite gone, and his eyes were changed too. He clutched at us with great, cold, frenzied hands.

But we shook loose and hurried on down the corridor. There were unoccupied rooms along it, many opening from rear doors into other corridors, and passages to the rear stairs and to the third floor. A window opened to a little balcony at the end. We looked about and whispered

SUMMONS

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF THE STATE OF OREGON FOR LANE COUNTY

S. A. Mogan, Plaintiff, vs. Helen L. Mogan, Defendant. To Helen L. Mogan, the above named defendant:

IN THE NAME OF THE STATE OF OREGON: You are hereby summoned and required to appear and answer the complaint of the plaintiff filed against you in the above entitled suit on or before the last day of the time prescribed in the order of publication, to-wit: on or before August 2, 1928, and if you fail to so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the above entitled court for a decree of absolute divorce against you, and for such other relief as to the court shall seem equitable.

This summons is published pursuant to an order made by Hon. G. F. Skipworth, Judge of the above entitled Court, on the 3rd day of July, A. D. 1928, which order directs that this summons be published for four weeks in the Springfield News, a newspaper of general circulation published in Lane County, Oregon, and that you be required to appear and answer on or before the last day of the time prescribed in said order, to-wit: on or before the 2nd day of August, 1928.

Date of first publication, July 5, 1928. Date of last publication, August 2, 1928. S. M. CALKINS, Attorney for Plaintiff. Residence and Postoffice address Eugene, Lane County, Oregon.
J. 5-12-19-26; A. 2:

to each other, and then went back for candles. We held them high and peered in the corridor and among the curtains. The elder Hayward kept close behind us, uttering low, inarticulate sentences, not particularly worth listening to.

He had forgotten our scene in the den a few hours before. His present emotion left no room for remembered anger. It looked as if he were trying to keep close to me.

"Did you see it—when it passed my door?" he was crying. "You know what it was—just as I know, too. There's no use pretending any more. It was there, and I saw it, and so did you. And I'll leave this house tomorrow!" He seemed to be talking to himself rather than to us. "We can keep the arrangements we've got, and Vilas can tend to 'em. I'll go tomorrow for good and all! And Vilas can stay with his wench if he likes."

Ernest stopped aside him. "We will remember that word—a better time," he promised. Then he whirled to me. "The thing's got away—but this is one going more I want to do before I go to bed. I want to look in Ahmad Das' room—just to see if he's in bed and asleep, as he ought to be."

So we took the candle and went on back into the main hall. Then we muffled a flight to stairs. At a little room, clear at the end of the corridor, we stopped to knock.

No answer came, so we knocked again. Then we pushed open the door. Ahmad Das was not in his room.

His bed had not been slept in. "Does it mean anything to you?" Ernest asked me.

"Nothing whatever—any more than the rest of this devilish mystery means. Do you suspect—that Ahmad Das is perpetrating something?" "I suspect nothing. I only want you to recall a few little points that will undoubtedly be a great source of pleasure to you." He spoke with a grim humor. "You must have heard stories—every man has—of men shooting at hyenas in Africa, wounding them, tracing them to the huts of natives, and then finding—not a hyena—but a black man, dying, with a bullet in him."

"I've heard the stories, and they don't make good sense."

"And maybe you haven't heard of the theory of the transmigration of souls?"

"Every man of education has heard it," I replied. "If you have, just remember these little points. One of them is that the transmigration of souls—that the soul of an animal can live again in the body of a man—is a rather current belief in India. Ahmad Das is of Hindu blood. And he was born at the same hour that my father's tiger was killed."

He laughed grimly, and gave me a cigarette. Then we walked out into the hall.

Ernest and I found the elder Hayward in the library. He stood shivering before the faint coals that had been the fire. All of us leaped when the front door opened.

It was Southley, and he carried a lantern. His clothes were simply drenched. He wore no hat, and his white hair was stringing about his worn face, and the water poured from him. His wet face glistened in the candle-light.

"What's this?" he asked. "Just a little midnight session," his son answered. "Tell us first why you went out in the rain, with no coat?"
