CABBAGE AND PLAIN FOLK

Mary Eagleston

It all leads up to cabbage, mere cabbage. This kind is not associated with "kings" but comes in a covered wagon to plain folk like ourselves and has won, just recently, such an enthusiastic welcome on the part of my neighbor that I have been puzzled ever since. She is a conscientious little woman, this lady across the way, with three children, all of whom I have noted as always looking very frail and thin and showing a very unchildlike lack of animation. Something stirs them sufficiently to get them from place to place—but never into mischief. Indeed, I have always thought there would be great rejoicing in that family if one of them should commit some childish prank. Once I saw one of them climb a tree and fall out and since then the three usually sit on the porch and play jacks. They often lose the ball because it rolls under a loose board and nestles beneath the steps. I suppose that if one of them had the energy to crawl under the porch, he would find balls enough side by side to start a miniature ten pin alley. However, as their mother is an indulgent parent and keeps a supply of pretty colored bouncers on hand, the three children are never without a game.

Now, I have been quite sure that it could not be any fault of my good neighbor that these children are so lacking in energy. She has fed them milk regularly. The barn yard has been recruited into service. Often I hear a hen cackle, the back door slams, and next a plump figure hastens to the chicken house. Then in a short while an egg-milk is given to the child that seems most puny. I felt sorry for my neighbor one day last month when I was calling on her. "Johnny, The Elder," as he is called, had just come in from school. He had taken his ball and jacks and was about to play when he asked his mother for a candy.

"No, dear, I'll get your milk for you in a minute," she answered.

"Aw, Mother please give me a

"Under-nourished! She said you were under-nourished!"

O, my poor neighbor! How indignant and embarrassed she was, and how out of place I felt to be there at that time! She explained to me at great length the quantities of milk she gave her three children, and I could vouch for it and tried to make her feel as comfortable as possible. Finally, she ejaculated, "I'm just going to see that nurse and give her a piece of my mind!"

I never knew what she got in return for a piece of her mind, but I have noticed some queer things lately. Just here is where the cabbage comes in. My neighbor has been getting a great deal of this green along with spinach, celery and lettuce, vegetables I never saw her buy before.

"We've all taken to cabbage," she said to me one day when we met at the provision wagon. "We have coleslaw or some raw vegetable and a cooked green every night."

"Is that so?" I asked, and "put my thinking cap on" as they used to say. What amazed me most, though, happened yesterday as I looked out of the window. "Johnny, The Elder," was jumping rope!
