CLOVER SEED GROWERS INVITED TO ATTEND CORVALLIS CONFERENCE

Growers of clover seed in the Springfield vicinity are invited to attend the Oregon Clover Seed conference which is to be held at the Oregon Agricultural college, Corvallis Friday, July 12, according to a letter received by the Springfield News from O. S. Fletcher, Lane county agricultural agent.

Trials of Oregon red clover seed in the eastern part of the United States have been unfavorable in recent years, making it increasingly difficult for Oregon growers to market their seed. The discussion of means for overcoming this objection will be one of the principal features of the conference.

A number of prominent seed growers and seed buyers in the Northwest will be on the program at the meeting. Among the topics to be discussed are "Red Clover Experiments in Oregon," "The Results of Red Clover Trials in the East," "The Clover Seed Market Situation," "The Importance of Clover Seed for my County," "Seed Cleaning and Weed Control," "Seed Testing and Seed Legislation," and "Seed Verification and Certification."

LATE STRAWBERRIES NOW ON LOCAL MARKET

The bulk of the strawberry crop in the Springfield vicinity has been harvested, and only the late berries are now being received at the local grocery stores. With the lessening of the production prices have been raised somewhat, the berries now selling for as high as two dollars a crate, whereas at the peak of the season they sold here for as low as $1.40 a crate. The production in this vicinity was quite large this year, despite the rains which damaged the early part of the crop.

The earliest cherries are just beginning to appear on local markets. Pie cherries and Black Republicans are on sale, but none of the larger varieties have ripened yet. The cherry yield in this part of the state is said to be quite negligible this year, having been greatly damaged by a killing frost when the trees were in bloom.
