COUNTY AGENT URGES THAT FARMERS PLANT HOME GROWN CLOVER

Lane county farmers interested in planting red clover for hay and pasture should give preference to locally grown seed, according to the county agent, O. S. Fletcher.

The county agent issued this statement when he learned that many Lane county farmers think that he and other representatives of the Oregon Agricultural college are recommending that farmers plant nothing but Ohio red clover seed. The Ohio seed is recommended for special seed growers only.

Re-Established Seed Here

In order to help re-establish the red clover seed industry of the Willamette valley, three Willamette valley wholesale seed dealers purchased a carload of an especially hardy strain of Ohio red clover and shipped it to Oregon during January for resale at cost. This seed was located and approved by Prof. G. R. Hyslop, head of the farm crops department of the Oregon Agricultural college, and was also approved by Dr. George Pieters, Forage Crop specialist of the United States department of agriculture.

The Ohio seed was brought to Oregon upon request of leading red clover seed growers of the Willamette valley, who attended a conference held at the agricultural college last July to discuss the red clover seed production industry. It was brought out at that meeting that Willamette valley red clover seed has not given good results in the eastern part of the United States, and that a hardy strain must be developed here.

Much Seed Purchased

Farmers of Lane county have purchased more than one thousand pounds of the Ohio red clover seed and will sow it on land where red clover seed has not been grown before, or is free from volunteer clover, so that the resulting seed crops will be of the Ohio strain. The extension service of the Oregon Agricultural college is working out a plan for inspecting fields planted with this seed so that farmers who produce seed may have it certified, thereby assuring a better demand for it.

While the special strain of Ohio red clover seed is recommended for farmers who have clean ground and who expect to produce clover seed, Mr. O. S. Fletcher, Lane county agricultural agent, and are available to those who care to call for them at the office. Dairying, poultry, horticulture, farm crops and general livestock are covered in the various bulletins.
