"Oh, I guess he will," Hamilton spoke soothingly, but it was clear that the matter of Jake's reception was not burdening his mind. Nor did the place disturb him, as he had expected it to. He was now in a state of wellbeing nothing could ruffle. Eve loved him Incidentally, he played the game as she would wish him to play it. Looking very handsome in his evening clothes, he followed the waiter to the table he had reserved, and consulted Eve at every stage of an elaborate supper order.

She, however, found it had to fix her mind on that vital interest. Her eyes were busy. She saw Maizie and Stella at the far end of the dancing floor, but apparently neither saw her. He glanced at her quickly. Queenie and Ivery were not in the room. However, the night was young and they would surely appear later.

"One moment, please," Eve said: and as he stopped she added quickly: "I came in to apologize again for leaving you so suddenly; and I've brought my husband with me. We were married the day after I left here."

She had never before seen Jake's smile. The phenomenon was worth witnessing, for it made Jake's cold mask suddenly and warmly human. The two men measured each other with a friendly glance.

gallantly told the lady. "But I'm sure she found herself growing nervous. glad to know everything's all right now." His black eyes were very huworried."

It was his exit line from their lives. "And yet some people think this is a hard world," Eve told Hamilton as their taxicab made its slow way through the Tenderloin's congested traffic. "I've had nothing but kindness. If I hadn't . . . I wonder what would have become of me if I'd had the sort of experience one often reads about?" "It doesn't bear thinking of." Hamilton recalled his thoughts on the night of Eve's disappearance and added hastily: "I'm glad we went to that place. Seeing it, and meeting that chap Jake, have changed my feelings about it."

"I thought they would," Eve smiled.

This was Carrick's idea of a joke and Hamilton ignored it. But he was on time for the appointment, and the psychiatrist, after greeting him exuberantly, talked for half an hour.

"I think it's an awful risk," Hamilton muttered.

"Are you setting up your judgment against mine?" "Yes.

Carrick laughed.

"Well, don't," he advised. "But I'll come down to the Garland during the morning, and put Miss Carrington through some more tests," he added, relenting. Then he sent the anxious bridegroom out of his office with a friendly push on the shoulder.

Hamilton was not an easy man to down. At five that afternoon he was again in Carrick's comsulting room, expressing the additional doubts that had come to him after the unsatisfactory results of the tests. At last Carrick, despite long experience with the anxious friends of patients, lost his temper.

"You realized, didn't you, that she didn't respond to any of the tests I made this morning?" he snapped. "You bet I did."

"Not even the piano meant anything to her, did it?" "It didn't seem to."

"And she's still afraid-panicky at "Yes. She says he has even given
