"WHITE CARGO" WHICH STIRRED ENGLAND IS SHOWN AT COLONIAL

The thousands of white men who toll in the territory on the Western side of Africa known as the Gold Coast have, in all probability, never heard of Earl Carrol, the theatrical producer, but to him they are indebted, nevertheless, for the improved living conditions which have been introduced there within recent years and which have made that district a comparative paradise.

Up to two years ago the rubber plantations which cover the territory were worked by men who, with few exceptions, dared not tell their right names in any civilized country. So unbearable were the hardships, so terrible were the degrading influences of the country, that only men who sought to bury unsavory pasts would consent to take jobs there. Of course, there were exceptions; the plantation executives were men of repute, but they had comfort in the thought that they could return to their homes when their contracts on the plantations were terminated.

London Aroused It was the play, "White Cargo," produced by Earl Carrol while change conditions. When this drama was presented in London the stir which it caused was much greater than the one which it met in this country. Americans were content to view the production merely as gripping entertainment, but in England it appealed not only as a theatrical masterpiece but as an indictment the administrations of the Gold Coast exploiters.

It is this film version, the all talking picture "White Cargo," is now showing as a special first run attraction at the Colonial. The producers of the picture have been wise in
