WALNUT DISEASE YIELDS TO SPRAY

Dr. Miller at O. S. C. Reports on Successful Blight Control; Work to Continue

Distinct progress toward a satisfactory method of control of walnut blight is reported in the annual compilation of experiments for 1931 made by Dr. Paul W. Miller, federal pathologist, who has been conducting investigations for two years in cooperation with the Oregon Experiment station.

While Dr. Miller cautions against acceptance of results to date as final, many growers who have seen the results of his work in the field are preparing to follow out the methods he has developed on their entire plantings this coming season. On some orchards this past season two spray applications of burdeaux mixture served to reduce the infection from blight from close to 20 per cent on untreated plots to less than a half of one per cent.

Walnut blight is the chief menace to the walnut industry both in Oregon and California, and until the present work of Dr. Miller no satisfactory control had been found. Infection was comparatively light in Oregon this year, yet it is thought to have averaged close to 15 per cent for the state as a whole.

Bordeaux mixture was tried out years ago without success. This failure, it now appears, was because of poor timing of the applications. Dr. Miller's latest findings are that under ordinary conditions two applications, one applied just before the blooming of the female flowers and the other when the nuts are about the size of small peas, will give satisfactory control in grafted orchards.

As rain is found to be the greatest factor in spread of the disease, certain climatic conditions or exceptionally bad blight infection may make a third application necessary when the nuts are about a half inch in diameter. Control in seedling orchards is more difficult because of the irregular blooming.

Some foliage damage from the bordeaux spray is to be expected, but it has not proved to be a vital factor, says Dr. Miller's report. Experiments will continue in an effort to eliminate it, however. Bordeaux 3-3-50 has proved as satisfactory as stronger strengths.

NEW GRAPPLER ON FRIDAY CARD

Wrestling fans who have been following the cards booked at the Eugene armory will find a pleasant surprise in store for them this week with the announcement of two brand new names to feature the headline exhibition.

Herb Owen, matchmaker, has succeeded in signing two prominent welterweight grapplers from the East for the Friday show. They are Pete Metropoulos and Art Perkins. Lane county fans have not had an opportunity to see either of these men in action before. They come highly recommended and ought to put on an interesting exhibition.

The capture of the welterweight belt by Robin Reed a coast man, has caused many of the best men in the East to come to the coast looking for a chance to go after it. It is understood that both of these wrestlers would welcome an opportunity to wrestle for it.

A forty-five minute special event, which is sure to satisfy those fans who seek rough action, will be offered with Jimmie King, of last week's card, matched against Harold Heibert, otherwise known as the Terrible Swede from Tacoma.
