Oregon has the broadest and most satisfactory cooperative act in the United States, under which has grown up a more or less standard form of organization known as the "Oregon Plan," according to a leading article in the national Cooperative Marketing Journal.

The article, written by George O. Gatlin, extension economist at O. S. C., says that Oregon's accomplishments in this field are now so widely known that increasingly large numbers of letters from many parts of the country are received asking for copies of the organization plan used here.

"Although the Oregon plan is neither unique nor strictly uniform, it does have certain distinctive features and provisions which have been a vital factor in making Oregon outstanding for progress, soundness and success in agricultural cooperation," says Mr. Gatlin.

"The Oregon plan of organization, adopted by more than 40 cooperatives in the past two or three years, is really a long-time program to advance cooperative enterprises through understanding, technical improvement and unity of effort."

Use of this semi-standardized plan of organization, based on many years of past experience in this state, has the advantage of simplifying and facilitating organization promote understanding, and encourages and makes easier consolidation or federation, Mr. Gatlin writes.

Encourages Wasteful Logging "Forest taxation, as generally in effect in the United States, also constitutes a major obstacle to the practice of forestry on private lands in that it effectually discourages the methods of cutting and silvicultural and protective measures necessary to keep forest lands continuously productive."

"It is not practicable or necessary that the Timber Conservation Board seek to formulate in detail the sound and practicable methods of taxation most desirable in each state or in each locality or under all circumstances. The congress of the United States, recognizing the magnitude and seriousness of this problem, has provided for a thorough nationwide study of forest taxation principles and practical methods of application by regions and under varying conditions. This study is now under way and nearing completion through the Forest Taxation Inquiry of the U. S. Forest Service.

"Accordingly, it is recommended that the earnest consideration of the principal timber states be invited to the public need of such modification of present prevailing methods of timber taxation; that the Forest Service be urged to make available at the earliest practicable time the conclusions and recommendations resulting from its investigations in this critical economic problem; and that consideration be given to the possible desirability and the practicability of enlisting concerted state interest and securing concerted state action through a conference of the governors of the principal timber states.

The board believes the time is ripe for a thorough study of the possibilities of a yield tax for the following reasons:

1. Public recognition, through the Timber Conservation board has been given to the fact, long known to lumbermen and county officials, that the prevailing tax system is a source of over-production in lumber and of financial demoralization within the industry.

2. Over-production and demoralization bring with them wholesale unemployment and serious difficulties to lumber communities; and

3. Delinquency of timber taxes is also becoming a serious problem along the West Coast. The effect of non-tax payments by timber-owners on local revenues is not yet known but it will undoubtedly add to the difficult problem of how to conserve the public revenue from timber resources.

The trustees of the West Coast Lumbermen's association have been asked to make an investigation of the situation in Oregon and Washington. These men are not sure that the yield tax system is the answer to the present and future economic problems of the industry in Washington and Oregon, but they do believe the yield tax system, in line with the recommendation of the federal Timber Conservation board, should be carefully

Timber Tax Subject Is of Government Study

Forced Cutting of Trees to Meet Financial Assessments Held Partly Responsible for Condition of Industry.

The plight of the timber owner who annually is assessed a tax on standing timber, aside from the land tax, and who at the same time finds no market for his product and is therefore unable to sell a sufficient quantity to enable him to meet these taxes has been the subject of discussion among tax-collecting groups for some time. A continuation of the present system, they feel, will eventually eliminate the private owner of standing timber.

To carefully study this matter and to investigate possible means of remedying the situation the last congress created what is known as a Timber Conservation Board. A recommendation by this body issued on August 1, 1932 follows:

Tax Forces Low Sales "The present and prospective annual burden of taxation on mature standing timber distinct from the land upon which it grows is the most important single present factor forcing the sale or cutting of timber without due regard to the current market for forest products. This condition is basic and its adverse effect cumulative. It is not a result of the general depression; nor will it be corrected by general economic recovery. Its economic importance varies widely between regions and between individual owners in each region. But it has become a controlling factor in a sufficient proportion of timber ownerships to effect and to involve the entire range of forest products industries.

"The present and future security of private ownership of merchantable standing timber as well as the maintenance of reasonable current balance between production and consumption of forest products requires the substitution, in the principal timber states, of an equitable system of income or yield taxation for the present prevailing system of property taxation.

examined. Perhaps the yield tax contains the answer.

The study will be undertaken immediately by the association staff under the direction of Colonel W. R. Greeley, secretary-manager.
