Crops Reviewed by College Extension Specialist

With the greatest prospective acreage of spring-planted field crops in recent history of the state, because of the destruction of fall Morrison, domestic science and extension crops specialist at Oregon crops by freezing, E. R. Jackman, State college, has reviewed the prospect and outlook for these various crops in Oregon so far as present information permits.

Through the eastern Oregon wheat belt the acreage is so vast that about the only possibility is to lace" will be given Friday, March seed spring wheat despite the low price, as wheat can be sold for something, while heavy increases in oats or barley would merely glut the feed market, Jackman says. Care in replanting red wheats such as Marquis where reds are frozen out, and white wheats such as the Federations where white had been sown, is highly important to avoid discounts from mixing.

West of the mountains the situation is different, however, as oats, barley, corn or flax will in most cases bring a better return normalgirls basketball teams of the Pleas. ly than spring wheat. Early seedant Hill high school at a progres. ing of gray oats or OAC No. 7 barley, or later seeding of Victory oats or Hennchen barley is a good bet, he says.

Corn Good Home Feed For home feed especially corn of-

Though, flax seed is working downward in price compared to recent years, it is still about 21/2 times that of wheat, while yields are usually a little better than half that of spring wheat. A ready mar ket in Portland is assured, and seed may be had there at about $1.20 an acre.

The seed crop outlook is promisng in the main, Jackman adds. Both alsike and red clover are cleaning up well, and the nationwide agitation to seed low yielding lands to grass and clover is favorable to the future demand for alsike and alfalfa and to some extent red clover. The outlet for Ladino clover is also expanding and good Oregon growers are really making money. Austrian peas and hairy vetch have been damaged to such an extent that low production is in prospect with probably increased demand.
