COLOR IS IMPORTANT IN JUDGING HAY QUALITY

College Specialist Tells Methods Of Examining Hay To Determine Food Value

Of all factors indicative of the quality of hay, color is the most telltale, says Eugene Gross, of the farm crops department at Oregon State college. While the intensity of color naturally varies with the type of hay, certain colors are characteristic of hay that has been cut too late, others are indicative of damage from bleaching by the sun, leaching by rain, or heating from being stored in a green or wet condition.

Hay of highest quality is of a bright, deep green color, because that color is associated only with hay that has been cut fairly early before blossoming has progressed very far, and has been cured rapidly and sufficiently to prevent heating in storage, Mr. Gross says.

Texture of Hay Important Among the other important factors to be considered in judging hay are texture, leafiness, purity, odor, and temperature, and all of the University of Washington NEEDY STUDENTS TO GET of purity, can be controlled to some WORK THROUGH SERA extent by having practices used, according to Mr. Gross.
