On deck, Kearney named him Little Willie, after a kid of his own. Then we put for the reef, which had a smooth lagoon inside of it, and was altogether as well cut out for a whale academy as any place you could find in the geography.

"Well, as things went on the experiment seemed to be a success. Little Willie absorbed education as if his father had been a college president. He would be pointing at the target with his index-finger like a cat's tail when she's watching for a mouse, and then when Kearney would give the signal by prodding him with a harpoon he would shoot forward like a bullet and hit that bulge a swipe that would rattle it like a dynamite blast.

"I don't know where all this was going to end, Little Willie kept growling bigger and bigger, and we had to keep firing him with new harpoons in place of those half rotten and getting more holes to take the place of those he was shooting off of them. 'Mish' and then he came back, innocent and self-satisfied for his sugar.

"Now you see what happened to the Kathleen, don't you? The whale was a lean' head on the skin when they train the harpoon into him. He took that for the signal, and without stopping to think he carried out his trainin'."
